MICKELSON STIFF AT 17

mascherano

09 Apr 10 23:43

your making it sound like he has already won

BJG

09 Apr 10 23:43

Ye Yang gimme birdie on 17

mascherano

09 Apr 10 23:43

yes madlung. couse is set up for a low score tomorrow. players at E can shoot -6 or something like that and be within 3/4 of the lead

BJG

09 Apr 10 23:44

Phil 3/4 ft for birdie

Cardiff,

Any time you think a price is good value and you can afford to bet that price within your bankroll constraints (whether they be mathematically derived, or merely an amount you're willing to lose) then what's happened in the past is irrelevant.

The only time this would be wrong is if you'd backed Tiger already to your limit and then thought he was still value and wanted to back him again.

If you're willing to lose £100 on the event and your earlier trade made you £30 all green, it's probably wise to make sure you only go to £70 red on the next bet (the £100 you were willing to lose in the first place. The £30 green you have now is your money, to do with what you want).

I'll make dozens of trades in an event. The good gamblers probably make hundreds. Any time you think a price is value and your maximum red can take it, you should trade, irrelevant of previous mistakes or successes.

7.2 for Phil to make what should be a sure birdie, thank you. Again, trading to hopefully sell at 6.6 or lower.

BBC TV says Yang -4 after 16.
US PGA leaderboard says Yang -2.
Cabbages.

Lori, I partially agree. The reason for partially greening is you may be happy with your lot at that stage. You may have backed said outcome with the idea that if the pick runs well for a certain number of holes by the end of the second round, say, giving you a chance to reduce your liability without giving away to much green, you can.

I backed Westy at 32, with the intention of greening up to level on every outcome at 2/1 or so on Sunday.

His price got there or thereabouts, earlier than I expected, with 45 holes to go, so I have decided to green out for my stake at 3.2, without greening up for every outcome, because from here I feel Westy could go either way, I want to take this unexpected opportunity to green out some, but dont want to give away too much already, so have partially greened.
