PayPal has just launched an upgraded iPhone applica

and includes a facelift that's meant to help instill a greater sense of security. And it also brings wi Technologies, the startup that lets you exchange information simply by tapping smartphones tog prominently featured in the PayPal iPhone application as a quick way to initiate transactions. Yo app here.

PayPal has offered a free application for the iPhone ever since the App Store launched in mid-2008, but it's been improving over time. Today's release brings a handful of significant new features. First, it no longer requires a money request to your contacts (it's essentially a bill). Second, you can now withdraw money out of the app and deposit it into your bank account. And there's the Bump integration, which allows you to exchange money by tapping two iPhones together and entering the amount of the transaction — finally, an easy way to help friends who always seem to be out of cash.

The PayPal app includes a few more minor new features. There's now an integrated tip calculator, a reminder function that alerts you when you need to send or withdraw money. And the application also includes the 'PayPal For Kids' program, which allows kids and teenagers to access a PayPal sub-account that PayPal's iPhone app is only one component of the company's mobile strategy. Last spring it part launch of the BlackBerry App World store, and it has also integrated with eBay's mobile applicati easily integrate PayPal functionality using a PayPal library. And aside from the iPhone app, it offe applications for Android and RIM phones as well (the company plans to brings these apps up to release over the next few months).

This is also obviously very big news for Bump, which is still a young startup (the company took p was funded by Sequoia last fall). Bump and PayPal declined to disclose the details of the partne
