

■ CRASH: Dutch prime minister says it is too early to assign blame

MH17 shot down from ground: Report

THE HAGUE/GRABOVO — Malaysia Airlines flight MH17 broke apart over Ukraine due to impact from a large number of fragments, the Dutch Safety Board said on Tuesday, in a report that Malaysia's prime minister and several experts said suggested it was shot down from the ground.

The crash over pro-Russian rebel-held territory in eastern Ukraine on July 17 killed 298 people, two thirds of them from the Netherlands.

Ukraine and Western countries accuse the rebels of shooting it down with an advanced, Russian-made missile. The main rebel leader repeated earlier assertions that his forces did not possess such weapons.

The report said MH17 crashed due to a "large number of high energy objects" penetrating the fuselage. "There are no indications that the MH17 crash was caused by a technical fault or by actions of the crew," it said.

Although the report did not mention a missile, impact with a large number of fragments would be consistent with a "proximity" warhead, designed to explode in the air and hurl shrapnel at its target, said Tim Ripley, a defence analyst with Jane's Defence Weekly magazine.

Such warheads can be fitted to a number of missiles, including the Russian-made BUK surface-to-air missile that Ukraine and Western allies, including the U.S., say was fired by separatists who probably hit the airliner by accident.

"The preliminary report suggests that high energy objects penetrated the aircraft and led it to break up midair," Malaysian Prime Minister Najib Razak said in a statement. "This leads to the strong suspicion that a surface-to-air missile brought MH17 down, but further investigative work is needed before we can be certain," he added.

Dutch Prime Minister Mark Rutte said it was still too early to assign blame: "We need to be careful not to draw conclusions too quickly," he told journalists. "Step-by-step, the experts are working to reach irrefutable conclusions." A final report by the board is not expected until mid 2015. The Netherlands is also running a separate investigation into the possibility of criminal charges against suspected culprits. Russian authorities have suggested in the past that other theories were possible, including that the plane may have been shot down from the air. However, the report found no military aircraft in the vicinity.

"It's consistent with a hit by a ground missile," said Joris Melkert, a lecturer in aerospace engineering at the Technical University of Delft. "What could cause a pattern of high velocity particles 10 kms up in the sky? As far as I can see, the only thing that could do that is a rocket," he said. "The report finds there were only three other aircraft in the vicinity: Two Boeing 777s and one Airbus A330, so both civilian, which makes the surface-to-air missile more likely."

The investigation has been hard because the crash took place near the front line. Although a small number of Malaysian inspectors and Dutch body recovery experts reached the site, fighting kept Dutch air crash investigators away. A ceasefire this week means the area is quieter at last.

In the beginning they were all coming here, the Dutch, the Malaysians, but then they stopped because of the fighting," said Vasily, a retired miner, near the site on Tuesday. "Now it's the ceasefire and things have calmed down here a lot." Most of the wreckage is still lying in Ukrainian wheat and sunflower fields. Passenger seats, suitcases, clothing, toys, and bags of mail were still scattered across the rolling fields around Grabovo village on Tuesday.

Large parts of the aircraft, including a big piece of wing, still lay in the open, along with flowers laid by residents to honour the dead. Bits of fuselage — some torn apart, some burned, some melted from the intense heat of the crash — lay several hundred metres away, with landing gear and engine parts.

'Open to the possibilities'

MIKE BEITZ
Staff Reporter

Where there's a will, there's a way.

And when it comes to the development of the former Cooper property in Stratford, a solid vision doesn't hurt either.

That was the consensus of the panel organized Monday night by the local branch of Architectural Conservancy Ontario (ACO).

While the will and the vision are being cultivated, the way to begin is by changing the public perception that the former locomotive repair shops are "a relic of a bygone age and should be torn down," Stratford/Perth County ACO president Rick Hubbard told a crowd of more than 60 at the Queen's Inn.

The theme of that campaign, he noted, is "Be Open to the Possibilities," and each member of the panel touched on that during their presentations.

Stratford author Dean Robinson gave a historical overview of the site, starting in 1856, when the first Grand Trunk Railway train rolled into Stratford.

Over the next 100 years, the building, the company and its employees played a significant role in Stratford's economic, social and cultural vitality, he noted.

"Stratford would not be the city it is today had it not been for its connection to the GTR and the CNR," said Robinson. "It's a relationship that should be recognized. It's a relationship that should be celebrated."

Local designer and heritage consultant Thor Dingman agreed, pointing to Waterloo's Tannery District and the Seagram Distillery as just a few examples of successful revitalization projects involving heritage properties.

Stratford, by contrast, seems to be caught up in a "culture of demolition" with regard to the Cooper site, he said, tracing years of neglect, lost buildings and legal battles before the expropriation of the property for the University of Waterloo Stratford campus.

"We've spent more than $20 million, and we've ignored all our heritage," he said in summary, suggesting the city needs to start thinking more creatively about the property.

"Let's not be myopic," said Dingman. "Let's keep our eyes open to possibilities."

Stratford architect Michael Wilson discussed the possibility of selective demolition, leaving a "steel cathedral" as a starting point for potential development.

"It's an architect's dream," said Wilson. "There are just so many uses that could be placed inside the building."

MacDonald elated with historic find

It could hardly have turned out better.

The discovery Sunday by a Canadian search team of one of the two ships from the Franklin Expedition of 1845 is being hailed as a great historical discovery.

"Very, very exciting," said Stratford's Tim MacDonald, who, as a founding member of the Arctic Research Foundation (ARF), was invited to a breakfast Tuesday morning in Ottawa by Parks Canada.

"We were elated on a number of levels," said MacDonald. "Of course, we were excited on the weekend when it was announced a number of artifacts had been found."

MacDonald and ARF co-founder Jim Balsillie of the Kitchener area travelled to Ottawa together where they later were present for Prime Minister Stephen Harper's announcement — with lots of media present — that a Franklin ship had been found.

"The tempo certainly picked up this morning," said MacDonald in a Tuesday interview with The Beacon Herald.

MUZAFFARABAD/SRINAGAR — The death toll from the heaviest rain to fall on Kashmir in 50 years rose to more than 400 on Tuesday, with thousands still trapped on rooftops and residents criticizing Indian and Pakistani authorities for not doing enough to help them.

On the Indian side of the heavily militarized Line of Control that divides the Himalayan region, the city of Srinagar lay submerged along with more than 2,000 villages.

"The damage is shocking," a senior official from India's National Disaster Response Force said in New Delhi. "People have been stranded on the rooftops of their homes for the last three days in some parts of Kashmir."

The official, who requested anonymity, said he would have deployed disaster-response teams earlier, but "we were all caught off guard because there was not a single warning issued by the weather office. The flash floods took us by surprise."

India's meteorological department had forecast heavy rain in Kashmir last week, but the Central Water Commission, which issues flood advisories, has been criticized by Indian media for not warning the state.

Some 47,000 people have been evacuated from their homes in India, where 217 were reported dead by Tuesday. The Indian Air Force has air-dropped more than 550 tons of relief material, and 80 medical teams have established emergency health services in government schools and state-run health care centres.

The flooding is the first major humanitarian emergency under India's new prime minister, Narendra Modi, but also came at a difficult time for Pakistani Prime Minister Nawaz Sharif, who has faced weeks of street protests aimed at forcing him out.

■ CANADA'S OUTDOOR FARM SHOW: Sebringville's Nuhn Industries part of opening ceremonies

Farm show opens with a splash

HEATHER RIVERS
QMI Agency Southwest

There was a little scene stealing at play at the opening ceremonies of Canada's Outdoor Farm Show.

Agriculture Minister Jeff Leal watched as University of Guelph president Franco Vaccarino cut the ribbon on the back of a pickup truck while, on the pond behind them, a lagoon crawler – a type of amphibious vehicle – was making a big splash.

Invented by Ian Nuhn, a 24-year-old former Wilfred Laurier business student from Sebringville, the crawler gave a dramatic aquatic performance of just what an agitation boat can do.

Nuhn, the son of Nuhn Industries president Dennis Nuhn, said farmers were formerly purchasing pumps and putting them on barges to take solids and sand from the bottom of big lagoons to mix with liquids on top. Powered with four-wheel drive, the Nuhn machine can drive itself into and manoeuvre itself around a manure lagoon.

"People were demanding something different," Nuhn said. "The lagoon crawler" does a better job of agitating.

The star, unveiled as a prototype last year at the farm show, wowed the industry by winning an innovation award in Illinois at the Farm Progress Show.

Despite a solid price tag of $150,000, Nuhn said they have already sold 38, with plans to build 10 more for delivery in the fall.

Site's heritage is meaningful

From A1

Dividing the structure into smaller buildings would make it more manageable, he said, envisioning a mix of uses across the entire property that could include a private-sector development, a new YMCA, police station, bus depot and 600-car parking structure.

Toronto architect Catherine Nasmith presented a few examples of adaptive reuse of heritage buildings, including the award-winning rehabilitation of Alton Mill, and developer Alex Spiegel of Windmill Development Group outlined that company's ambitious plan for a major urban redevelopment of a former industrial site spanning the Ottawa River.

The key to projects like that, and to the redevelopment of the Cooper site here, said Spiegel, is having a clear vision that will galvanize people.

"You need a strong vision of what you want to see," he said, adding that it still needs to be rooted in "hard market realities."

John Lewis offered to help with that vision.

The University of Waterloo professor in the school of planning said he will be putting his urban planning students to work to help "articulate some of those possibilities" for the Cooper site. Open houses will be planned Unveiled last summer, the Nuhn Lagoon Crawler gave a demonstration at the opening of Canada's Outdoor Farm Show Tuesday morning at the Ducks Unlimited Farm Pond.

HEATHER RIVERS/QMI AGENCY SOUTHWEST

Nuhn is one of 750 exhibitors spread over 40 hectares at the show that Ontario's agriculture minister described as "the world's greatest outdoor farming show."

Leal said he was delighted to be at the farm show for the very first time and "be in touch with folks who drive our agricultural sector every day."

"What a great experience," he said. "It's a great opportunity for me to head down the road and take in the show."

He said the agricultural sector is responsible for $34 billion in gross domestic product and sustains 740,000 jobs every day. The show was also a first for the new University of Guelph president.

"I'm absolutely delighted and incredibly energized to be here," Vaccarino said. "One of the things that attracted me to joining the University of Guelph was its connection with rural areas... this show, in part, is a great context for that."

Meanwhile show president Doug Wagner said his staff enjoyed spending two weeks setting up the show, where they "encountered all sorts of challenges."

"We're looking forward to some pretty exceptional activity," Wagner said. "The buzz word is experienced technology — we're all about technology transfer which is showing new innovations to farmers so they can adapt them for their operations."

Wagner said there is "an incredible amount of business" done at the show.

"I like to say, 'See it, feel it, touch it and buy it,'" he said. "If the deals aren't made now, they are made between now and the new year."

Woodstock Mayor Pat Sobeski said he has been to the farm show many times over its history.

"It gives you a sense of the tremendous size of the agricultural sector," he said. "There is well over a billion dollars in equipment on site here."

While Woodstock thinks of itself as urban, Sobeski said the city has "a real rural basis" that is vital to our economy.

"The strength of the agriculture industry is important for Woodstock," he said.

■ CRIME: Police release images of suspects

Toronto war memorial vandalized again

CHRIS DOUCETTE
QMI Agency

TORONTO — The hunt is on for six vandals responsible for the latest attack on a recently restored war monument at a Toronto high school.

Toronto Police have released surveillance video images of the group — four men and two women — who were captured by security cameras as they approached the First World War statue at the high school on Toronto's east side around 4 a.m. on Aug. 23.

"A man climbed onto the sculpture and removed the sword," Const. Jennifer Sidhu said in a statement released Tuesday. "The man took photographs with the sword and then left the area."

The 1920s monument — a memorial to the 25 Malvern Collegiate alumni killed while fighting in France and Belgium — has been repeatedly vandalized over the years.

The granite soldier underwent a $44,000 restoration a few years ago and his broken arm and missing sword were replaced at that time.

But just days after the refurbished statue was unveiled in November 2011, vandals struck again causing several thousand dollars in damage.

■ POLITICS: Former prime minister puts blame on Obama for cool U.S.-Canada relationship

Mulroney praises Harper's economy

DAVID AKIN
National Bureau Chief

OTTAWA — Former prime minister Brian Mulroney says Stephen Harper is "a very consequential prime minister" who deserves re-election "on his economic record alone."

Mulroney, Canada's 18th prime minister, made his comments in an interview with CBC Radio Montreal Tuesday morning on the occasion of the 30th anniversary of leading the Progressive Conservatives to the largest majority win in Canadian history.

Last week, Mulroney spoke to CTV on the same occasion, but some of his remarks in that interview were widely seen by many pundits as an attack on Harper's record, particularly when it comes to foreign policy.

"You know, it's interesting — when I make complimentary references, no attention is paid by the media but anytime there's a disagreement we get headlines," Mulroney told CBC Radio Tuesday.

And while Mulroney moderated his comments somewhat on Harper's foreign policy, he was gushing in praise for the core component of Harper's domestic policy.

"I've said dozens of times that I think that on the economic record alone established by Prime Minister Harper and (finance ministers) Jim Flaherty and now, Mr. (Joe) Oliver, the government should be re-elected with a majority just on the basis of the quite impressive way they've handled the economy now for eight years," Mulroney told CBC Radio.

"One of the parts of that — and I think it's important — is their trade policy which is the most expansive and innovative in 30 years."

Canada Free Trade Agreement, a deal which cost Mulroney significant political capital at the time — it was opposed by both the Liberals and New Democrats of the day — but is now widely seen as one of the most important factors in Canada's subsequent economic growth.

The Harper government has struck several free trade deals, most notably with the European Union and South Korea.

"This Canada-European Union deal and the Canada-South Korea deal is going to add billions to GDP and tens of thousands of new jobs and so, I've said many times, publicly, that Mr. Harper is a very consequential prime minister."

Fall to see normal temperatures

As snow continued to fall in parts of Alberta Tuesday, The Weather Network predicted near normal temperatures and precipitation this fall for much of Canada.

British Columbia will continue to experience above-normal temperatures, but it's expected to be a typical autumn for everyone else.

"Fall is the season where we usually see the most dramatic temperature and precipitation changes from month to month as we transition towards winter," Chris Scott, chief meteorologist at The Weather Network, said in a news release.

As for the winter, El Niño conditions in the Pacific Ocean might not necessarily mean a warmer winter for Canadians.

"History tells us that a weak El Niño centred more across the central Pacific can produce colder than normal winters across central and eastern Canada ..."

and they were all terrific one-on-one. I know that for years, Prime Minister Harper has tried pretty hard to form that kind of relationship and to get the kinds of reaction that we were privileged to get in our dealings with former presidents. But there has to be reciprocity on that."

When the discussion turned to reviving Montreal as a centre of economic influence within Canada, Mulroney also had words of praise and encouragement for former Liberal MP and now mayor, Denis Coderre, as well as the Liberal government in Quebec City of Philippe Couillard.

"We've got a new government in Quebec City that seems to be very much heading the right way. We've got a new mayor in Montreal who's doing an exceptionally good job. We've got a government in Ottawa that wants to co-operate in the most important area which is job creation and economic development and we had a pretty good run at coming back from that big recession, under Mr. Harper and Mr. Flaherty," Mulroney said.

■ LEGISLATION: Mackay says objective is to 'lower the demand' for prostitution

Justice minister calls bill a 'paradigm shift'

JESSICA HUME
National Bureau

OTTAWA — Justice Minister Peter Mackay says he believes his prostitution bill represents a "paradigm shift" in Canada because it deals with sex workers as victims who need help, rather than criminals who deserve punishment.

Mackay was back fielding questions on Bill C-36 Tuesday, this time before a committee of senators who were focused on whether it makes sense to criminalize the purchase of sex while granting immunity to those who sell it.

"The objective is to (lower) the demand and make prostitution illegal," Mackay said.

By allowing prostitutes to sell sexual services without fear of criminalization, the bill wouldn't prevent them from implementing safety measures such as bodyguards, Mackay said.

Under the previous law, prostitutes were effectively prohibited from hiring bodyguards because nobody was allowed to live "off the avails of prostitution."

The Supreme Court struck down that prostitution bill last December, citing specific sections as unconstitutional, and gave the government a year to come with something new.

Mackay told reporters Tuesday the justice department has advised him Bill C-36 is "likely" to pass constitutional challenges.

George Baker, a member of the Senate Liberal caucus, said history shows criminalizing johns tends to push prostitutes further into dark alleys where their personal safety is at greater risk. He asked how this bill — which prohibits the solicitation of sexual services in public or anywhere where children might be found — would be different.

Mackay said he believes it's impossible to eliminate "all the inherent dangers" of prostitution, but this bill comes closer than any other legislation Canada has seen before.

New smart watch and Apple Pay could transform market

CUPERTINO, Calif. — Apple Inc. unveiled a new watch, two larger iPhones and a mobile payments service on Tuesday as chief executive Tim Cook seeks to revive the company's reputation as a wellspring of innovation.

The first new product to be developed and introduced under Cook's reign is a wearable device tethered to the iPhone that will combine health and fitness tracking with communications.

Rival watch and wearable device makers are keeping a wary eye on Apple, which up-ended the music industry and drove once-dominant phone makers such as BlackBerry to the brink of extinction, and whose iPad helped shrink personal computer sales for a time before they recently recovered.

It has an enviable track record when it comes to mobile hardware, though it tends not to be the first to introduce a new-fangled product category. Rival electronics giants such as Sony Corp., Samsung, LG Electronics Inc. and Qualcomm Inc. already have launched smartwatches, albeit without much success.

The Apple watch will come in three distinct collections, including a sport edition and an upscale line coated in 18-karat gold.

"Compared to what's out there, it feels like it's very slender. I like the level of elegance and the three different lines, which include sport and luxury," said Angela Tafaya, at fashion blog Refinery29.

Bernstein Research analyst Toni Sacconaghi estimated on Tuesday that if Apple were to sell 30 million watches at $250 each, it would add about $7.5 billion to its revenue. The pressure was on for the world's largest tech company to wow at its "special event" in Cupertino. The prospect of the new watch attracted a broader swathe of attendees than usual, with celebrities, fashion industry editors and even health-care executives rounding out the mostly tech-industry crowd.

On Tuesday, the company also took the wraps off a larger, 12 cm iPhone 6 and 13 cm iPhone 6 Plus. They will support more than 200 telecom carriers worldwide, including all three in China, a key growth market for the company.

It also introduced a new mobile payments service dubbed "Apple Pay." Each phone will come equipped with its new payments service, which launches in the United States next month and allows users to pay for items in stores with their phones instead of physically presenting their credit or debit cards.

The move gives Apple access to a trove of data on how consumers shop in bricks and mortar stores, where more than 90% of U.S. retail sales are still conducted.

Barclays Capital said in a Sept 5 note that the mobile payments feature would give Apple "one of the largest sets of consumer transaction data in the U.S."

Each new iPhone will come with a "secure element" chip and a near-field communications, or NFC, antenna. In a rare move for the company, Apple planned on livestreaming its event online, with a simultaneous translation in Chinese. But the livestream went down for many users about a half-hour in, prompting many to take to Twitter to express their frustrations.

closest to money first. This is how I run my business and how I structure my pursuits." It isn't just CEOs who have had to make strategic decisions affecting how much they earn. An award-winning artist in Berlin told me she learned the importance of getting her "fair share" by observing her mother when she was growing up. Her mom was a wonderful baker who would use only the finest ingredients for baking, but she didn't do so well when she tried to turn her hobby into a business. She didn't charge enough to cover her costs and make a profit; she seemed to think that people wouldn't pay that much for her cakes.

"It annoyed me that she didn't have a sense of the value of her work and her efforts. I know from my own experience as an artist that there are people out there who are willing to pay a lot for certain things, so it would be naive of me to undervalue my work even though the perception of artists is that we aren't supposed to be materialistic. Money symbolizes your value as an artist or whatever else you do."

Sometimes we are so grateful to be pursuing our passion, or even just to have a good job, we aren't inclined to concern ourselves with how much we actually earn. But the onus is on the individual to do the research and find out the value of their contribution to the marketplace. From there, ask for this amount and don't settle for less.

It never feels good to be underpaid — we know in our hearts this isn't fair. Get paid for what you do!

Cost of domestic violence overlooked: Study

OSLO — Domestic violence, mainly against women and children, kills far more people than wars and is an often overlooked scourge that costs the world economy more than $8 trillion a year, experts said on Tuesday.

The study, which its authors said was a first attempt to estimate global costs of violence, urged the UN to pay more attention to abuse at home that gets less attention than armed conflicts from Syria to Ukraine.

"For every civil war battlefield death, roughly nine people ... are killed in inter-personal disputes," Anke Hoefler of Oxford University and James Fearon of Stanford University wrote in the report. From domestic disputes to wars, they estimated that all violence worldwide cost $9.5 trillion a year, mainly in lost economic output and equivalent to 11.2% of world gross domestic product.

■ LOCAL ECONOMY: Workforce doubles in only four months

Celebrating with Masterfeeds

SCOTT WISHART
Staff Photographer

It's not every day you hear of a Stratford plant nearly doubling its workforce in just four months. And when you do, it calls for a celebration.

Masterfeeds did one up in style on Tuesday, holding a barbecue in co-operation with Maple Lodge Farms at its facility on Park Street, just off Romeo.

"We've doubled the output of this plant," Masterfeeds Ontario general manager Peter Peacock said.

They do a tremendous job. They've done everything we've asked for, and they provide good service and a great product.”

Maple Lodge's Janice Thompson

"It's running six days a week, 24 hours a day. This is a great news story and nobody knows it." Masterfeeds' new relationship with Maple Lodge Farms is key to the increased production and the new jobs, Peacock noted.

The plant now has an agreement to supply broiler feed pellets to Maple Lodge, which is a major player in the Canadian chicken market. It is known as the largest independent family-owned chicken processor in the country. Maple Lodge's Janice Thompson, vice-president of agricultural operations, said she's pleased with what she's seen already from the Masterfeeds' operation.

"They have a professional team here," she said. "They do a tremendous job. They've done everything we've asked for, and they provide good service and a great product." The agreement to supply Maple Lodge has also meant significant capital investment at the plant, which was built in 1968 and has seen many upgrades since.

And a few more hirings are also on the horizon, Peacock noted.

Currently, the mill employs about 40 workers, 17 of whom were hired this year.

The afternoon-long barbecue was a way show local customers just how the plant works, Peacock said. But, mostly, it was a way to thank the Masterfeeds' workforce for all their efforts in the transition period.

"We've got a number of employees who have stood on their heads to change the plant in order to double the output," he said. "They've put in a lot of hard work and we wanted to say, 'Thank you.'"

■ TAKE BACK THE NIGHT: Annual Stratford walk scheduled for Friday

Demanding safer streets

Beacon Herald Staff

Led by the Wicked Riders women's motorcycle club, the annual Take Back the Night march to promote safe communities for women and children will take place this Friday, Sept. 12, at the Local Community Food Centre on Erie Street starting at 7 p.m.

"Take Back the Night is the one night of the year when women and children walk through the streets of Stratford with one another demanding safe streets," said Fern Sharp, awareness and resource co-ordinator for the Optimism Place Women's Shelter and Support Services.

"With this march, we demand safety in our homes and on our streets. Unfortunately, women and children are still not safe in their own community."

Following the march, guests can meet authors Judy Miller Rose and Heather Wharmam, who co-wrote Rose's memoir, Just When You Think It's All Over...

The work tells how Rose and her children survived abuse by her partner, including an attempted murder in 1983.

It documents how community support by agencies, including the London Police Service and the Women's Community House, helped save her life and protect her children. It also recounts how she and her children healed and flourished in their lives.

The event also features a used book sale. Anyone interested in selling books for women or children can rent a table for $10. Call 519-271-8778 for details.

All are welcome to the event, which is free admission, but only women can take part in the march. More information is available at www.optimismplace.com.

■ CITY COUNCIL: Stratford avoids costly OMB hearing

Green light for Pol project

DONAL O'CONNOR
Staff Reporter

A revised Pol Quality Homes housing project on St. Vincent Street was approved by city council Monday ending a standoff that was headed to an Ontario Municipal Board hearing.

Key to council's decision, which reversed an earlier position against the original project, was an agreement reached between the developer and Stackpole International, the nearby manufacturing company that had objected to Pol's earlier plans.

A revised development proposal limits the proposed project to a maximum of two storeys and would permit one unit with a maximum of 16 units and one with a maximum of eight units — a five-unit reduction from original plans for the former school property at 431 St. Vincent.

The earlier proposal included conversion of an existing structure to a three-storey apartment building with 24 dwelling units. Council was informed as well that the developer is no longer seeking a 27% to 30% reduction in the minimum landscaped open space requirement for the project.

Council's reversal, based on the revised application, followed a required two-thirds vote in favour of reconsidering the earlier decision.

Whether the reversal will be popular is another question. Close to 120 citizens had signed a petition opposing the rezoning of the property to permit the original proposal.

In taking its earlier position, council had acted contrary to planning advice received from the city's planning department.

Council's decision avoids an OMB hearing that would have cost city taxpayers an least $40,000. Councilors Keith Culliton, Bonnie Henderson, Brad Beatty, Tom Clifford, George Brown and Howard Farnie favoured reconsideration of council's earlier position.

Mayor Dan Mathieson was among those on council sticking with opposition to the project while Coun. Martin Ritsma declared a conflict of interest.

Council votes to raze hydro station

DONAL O'CONNOR
Staff Reporter

The Festival Hydro transformer station at 10 York St. is to be demolished following city council's approval Monday of a heritage permit to allow for its removal.

Because the building is located in the city's heritage district, the special permit is required.

The utility building, a low-lying structure on the north side of York

Street to the west of the municipal parking lot, has not been in use for the past two years.

At least in the short term, a fence is to be erected separating the property from the parking lot after the building is taken down.

Coun. George Brown suggested the building site be added to the adjacent municipal parking lot or left as parkland without any fencing.

He noted the city owns Festival Hydro.

"I think a fence looks silly," he said. "To me, it doesn't make sense."

A background report to council indicates Festival Hydro has concerns about possible contaminants in the building, including water and mould issues.

"It is only possible to eliminate the fence if the site is remediated of all contaminants," the report says.

Largely intact ship 'incredible'

From AI
Echoing the prime minister's remarks, MacDonald said the find is "a great historical discovery" and it supports Canada's ideas around sovereignty in the Arctic.

"It's especially wonderful for the Inuit people because it supports their tradition of oral story-telling and that's really where all their stories pointed to where the ship had been."

MacDonald termed the largely intact condition of the sunken ship "incredible."

It's the discovery the search team had been hoping for, reasoning that, if the ship went down in one piece, the Arctic water would have kept it in relatively good shape, even after more than 165 years.

MacDonald was among those to first see video images from the camera that was sent down to record the long-searched-for wreck.

"You can see canons on the deck ... a lot of fittings on the deck. The ship basically sank straight down and remained intact."

It's of huge historical significance, he said.

The ARF research vessel Martin Bergmann, a former fishing trawler purchased by the ARF and refitted for ocean research in the North, has been integral in the search effort led by Parks Canada. "I believe, as we speak, the Martin Bergmann is at the search site," said MacDonald.

The president and CEO of Ideal Supply said he expects to travel to the discovery site next summer.

In a recent interview just days after the Canadian flotilla began this year's search for the Franklin ships MacDonald said: "The perfect scenario would be to find the ships intact."

Sunday's discovery has undoubtedly heightened interest in finding the second ship as well.

COMMENT

Janay, Joanie, abused women deserve better

The video of Baltimore Ravens running back Ray Rice slamming his then-fiance, now wife, into the side of an elevator then hauling her apparently unconscious body into a hotel lobby like a sack of potatoes is sickening.

There are those who believe the Ravens cutting him and the lifetime ban from the league is an over-the-top punishment.

He may have been convicted in the court of Twitter, but he hasn't been found guilty of anything in a court of law. And we can see the video, but we don't know the context.

If Janay, Janay, went on to marry him — and she did — who are we to judge?

All good points, but nagging in my mind is a horrific murder that hit close to home for me. I left me shocked by the complex and deeply troubling nature of marital violence.

It's been almost 27 years since my friend Joanie was slain by her husband in England.

She and her mother were stabbed to death on Christmas Eve in front of her two children by her husband.

After years of abuse, Joanie had fled to what she thought was the safety of her mother's home, only to be pursued and murdered by her husband.

A post mortem examination showed numerous old injuries, evidence of the abuse she'd silently suffered.

Those who knew Joanie are still haunted.

What could we have done?

How could I not have seen the ongoing abuse? Joanie always insisted I stay with her when I was in England, largely, I now suspect, because her husband didn't beat her when I was there.

Or perhaps he did. Perhaps I just didn't see it. Perhaps I didn't want to see it.

I believe the NFL had no choice but to make a bold statement about violence against women.

In banning Rice for life, this high-powered organization that represents a high-testosterone, male-dominated sport has sent a message to the wider community that it's never appropriate to punch your future wife in the face.

On the video, Rice showed no remorse when Janay dropped to the ground.

Janay expressed anger at the media Tuesday. "To make us relive a moment in our lives that we regret every day is a horrible thing. To be something away from the man I love that he has worked his ass off for all his life just to gain ratings is horrific."

"This is our life."

If that's her life, there's a bigger problem. She may not want to press charges, but when there's overwhelming evidence a serious assault has taken place, the broader community has a responsibility to step up and say, "Enough's enough."

In my friend Joanie's case, few of her friends suspected anything was wrong.

Those who did and tried to help were rebuffed.

The final, sad chapter of the story unfolded 16 years later. Convicted of the two murders in 1987 and sentenced to life imprisonment, her husband was released from prison on probation in 2003.

In 2006, he murdered another woman with whom he was in a relationship and hanged himself. The woman was warned of his past by his probation officer, but claimed he was never violent with her and asked the officer not to contact her again.

Is Rice unfairly being made the scapegoat for the NFL's past omissions when it comes to domestic violence? Possibly. But I'm glad they've taken a stand that says society can no longer pretend there's nothing to see.

I've spent three decades wondering why and how I failed my friend Joanie. I'll never know the answer. I do know that pretending it didn't happen is not a solution.

Cherish the mystery of yourself

This week, I read about someone who finally gave in and got his first smart phone. Once he'd figured it out, he circulated a picture he took of himself. He called it his "first facie."

Such self-portraits, taken by pointing the camera toward you at the end of your extended arm or by turning it toward a mirror, are called selfies, but the man's misnomer "facie" is probably more accurate. Selfies are hardly portraits of the self, something far too elusive for a digital image.

The concept of self may sound like a religious category. Not so. A host of writers have pondered the self. In his mock self-help book Lost in the Cosmos, the late Walker Percy writes that you can "learn more in ten minutes about the Crab Nebula in Taurus" than you "presently know about yourself, even though you've been stuck with yourself all your life?"

Each of us is a mystery. Not the who-dun-it mystery to be solved by the last page or the end of the episode. In those cases, the mysteriousness must be dispelled for the truth to be known.

The self is a different mystery altogether; the mystery which does not shroud a truth you think through, but whose truth is itself the mystery. It's a mystery you don't solve; you live.

So I suppose I'm a bit of a mystery, as are you. I often wonder who I am. The answer, alas, is seldom simple. I'm all the people I've been until now, of course. I've been a bouncing baby boy (so my birth announcement read) and a pimply teenager boy. I've been teacher, student, musician, librarian, runner, philosopher, pastor and part-time jerk. I've briefly assumed a host of roles including a cowboy, a weight-lifter, Bob Cratchit, Elmer the Safety Elephant, Count Dracula, Fred Flintstone and a host of others even if it took Halloween or a dinner party to make them manifest.

All the me's I've been are buried inside keeping company with the me I am now. I'm also the sum of my ancestry. I move and talk like my parents. To borrow from Buddha, I am a candle lit from a candle lit from a candle. And believe me when I say that the self I am now is not who I was even, say, five years ago.

I don't know who you are, but I know this: that hardly a week goes by that you don't ponder, even for a moment, the mystery of your self. And that each of us should always relish the mystery of our identity.

So those casual, somewhat hedonistic off-centre portraits that make the rounds on Facebook and Instagram are more facies than selfies.

But here's the good thing. The more we try to fathom the mystery of who we are, the more faithful-less is revealed to be.

In the late 1980s and early 1990s, Lubicon Lake Cree Chief Bernard Ominayak was a darling of the Alberta left.

With his flowing black hair and ever-present black "Lubicon Lake Nation" ball cap, Ominayak mesmerized Canada's chattering classes with his tales of how his people had been overlooked by 19th-century treaty negotiators and so remained a sovereign nation.

Never mind that many longstanding residents of the Lubicon Lake area insisted Ominayak was an interloper who moved into their area from a neighbouring First Nation when he smelled a good opportunity. Ominayak got himself elected chief of the band nestled in the boreal forest about 75 km northeast of Peace River and began claiming his people were the only rightful government of the oil and gas-rich region.

He wouldn't rule out violence if energy development continued on Lubicon land before a land claim could be settled. Then he held out for two, three or more times what neighbouring bands had accepted. Because he was facing off against a Tory premier (Don Getty) and a Tory prime minister (Brian Mulroney), Ominayak's stock with journalists, activists and full-time cause-pleaders soared still higher.

Lefty priests and ministers flocked to Ominayak's side. Journalists fell all over themselves to tell his story and recount the struggles of his people against Big Oil and against uncaring Conservative politicians. The United Nations intervened on his behalf. He was feted in the capitals of Europe. Labour leaders claimed solidarity with him. Songwriters and actors held benefits for his band and thousands turned out to hear him speak and to donate money to the cause.

Even Mulroney and Getty paid homage and largely caved in to Ominayak's demands.

But time largely forgot Bernard Ominayak. Not even lefty reporters can maintain interest in a professional gossip-monger — a man who gets what he wants, only then to shift his demands still higher and farther away.

For two more decades the power struggle between Ominayak and those Lubicon Lake residents who refused to recognize his authority continued. In 2009, Ominayak had himself elected chief-for-life claiming that since the federal government had no authority over his people, his people were not bound by federal election rules for reserves. In 2013, when residents fed up with Ominayak organized a regular election and replaced him as chief, Ominayak broke away from the band and insisted he was the leader of a separate First Nation that was bound by "indigenous sovereign law," not Canadian law.

Two bad when he broke away, Ominayak forgot to take the records of the Cree Development Corporation with him. Now the new Lubicon Lake Chief Billy Joe Laboucan has asked the respected accounting firm Meyers Norris Penny (MNP) to conduct a forensic audit of the CDC's books. What MNP found is hardly shocking given the state of governance on hundreds of First Nations. But it should at least take the bloom off the Bernard Ominayak rose for those activists who still see him as a hero. While a spokesman for Ominayak has denied any wrongdoing (indeed, he denies any knowledge of the audit), MNP found that between 2006 and 2012, the Cree Development Corporation — controlled by Ominayak, his family and friends — spent $27.5 million of mostly taxpayers' money with little to show for it.

Ominayak is said to have pocketed $1.5 million, with a total of $2.7 million going to him and his inner circle, all while people on their reserve lived without running water. This has happened on reserve after reserve after reserve across the country: chiefs pleading squalor and desperation for lack of funding all while they are living large at Canadians' expense. It's chiefs as One-Percenters.

1939 — During a special session, Parliament approved a request by Prime Minister William Lyon Mackenzie King for Canada to join the war in Europe. It was the first time Canada made its own declaration of war as a sovereign nation.

1973 — A bomb blast rocked central London, injuring 13 people. The IRA later took responsibility for the attack that brought chaos to the British city.
