Leaders come out fighting

MARK KENNEDY
Ottawa Citizen

TORONTO — Canada's political leaders clashed over competing economic visions Thursday night in the first debate of a long election campaign.

The two-hour debate featuring the leaders of four parties began with a bang, as Conservative Prime Minister Stephen Harper fended off criticism from his rivals over his record in managing the economy as prime minister over the past decade.

NDP Leader Tom Mulcair, Liberal Leader Justin Trudeau and Green Leader Elizabeth May accused Harper of turning his back on the middle class, and doing little to create jobs as Canadian families saw their incomes stagnate in recent years.

Trudeau, who has seen his party's popularity drop in recent months, was particularly aggressive in his attacks on Harper — and also aimed his sights at Mulcair.

"You have become completely disconnected with the reality that people are facing across the country," Trudeau told Harper.

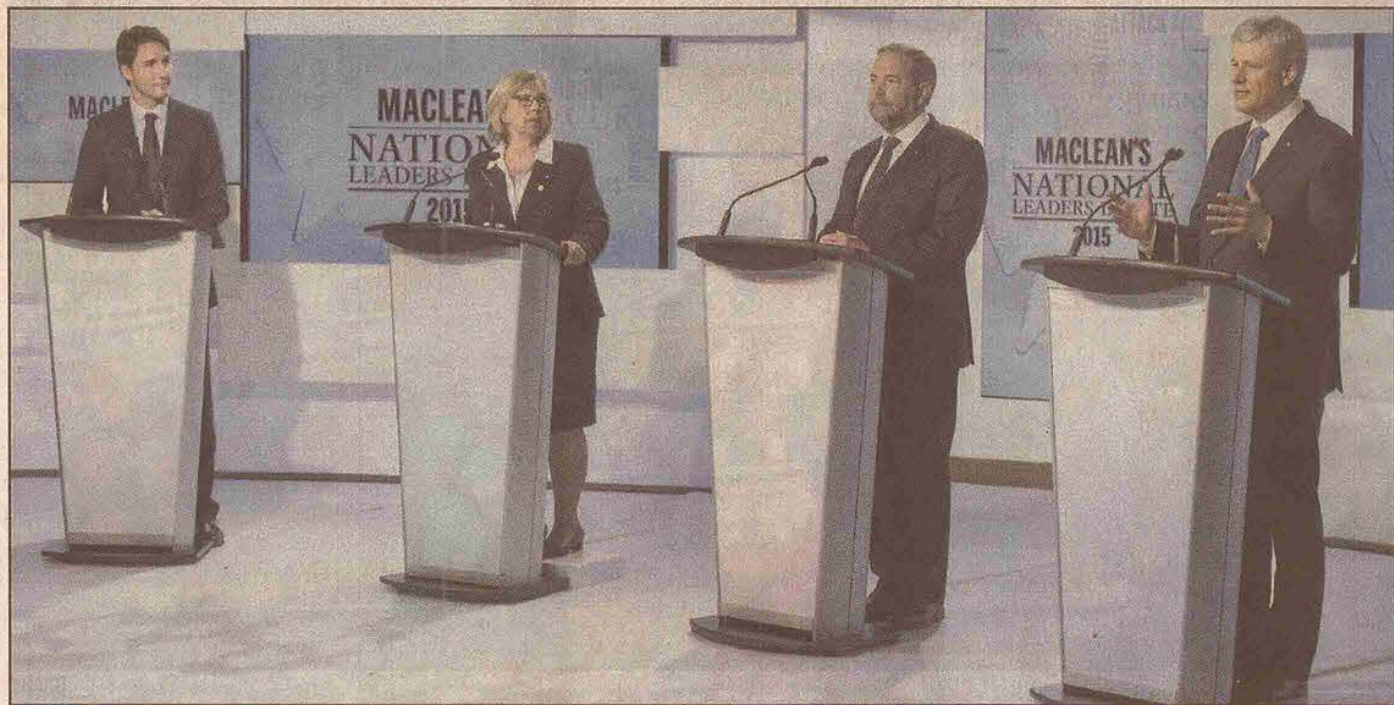

He reminded viewers that Harper's government has delivered eight deficits after inheriting surpluses from the Liberal government he defeated in 2006. Trudeau ridiculed Harper's statement that voters will be taking a big risk if they put his rivals in power.

"The only risk right now would be sticking with a failed plan for 10 years."

Mulcair blasted Harper for failing to take action to protect the manufacturing sector and protect jobs throughout the country.

"Incomes are flat-lining, household debts are skyrocketing."

Mulcair also said Harper is trying to deceive Canadians about the health of federal finances and is hiding the fact the country is still in deficit — not a surplus, as the governing Tories claim.

May, who participated in a debate with Harper in the 2008 election, reminded him of how he denied during that debate that the country was in recession.

She said Harper doesn't have a good "track record" spotting when the country is in recession "and we are in a recession now."

Harper fought back, saying his is the only party committed to providing a fiscally responsible government. For instance, he said his opponents would hike taxes through higher payroll premiums for the Canada Pension Plan.

"Now is not the time to throw us back in deficit and to spend billions of dollars."

Trudeau also repeatedly drew a bead on Mulcair, whose policies he must discredit if the Liberals hope to regain their standing in the polls.

Trudeau said Mulcair is giving workers "false hope" with promises of higher wages, when the NDP's pledge affects only those in the federally regulated sector.

"That kind of false advertising is simply irresponsible."

As well, Trudeau said the NDP is "pandering" to people who do not like corporations through its policy of tax hikes for large companies. But Mulcair defended that plan as fiscally responsible.

"We think corporations are not paying their fair share," Mulcair said.

The leaders entered their first debate of the race knowing the stakes are high.

The debate, hosted by Maclean's magazine, came just four days into the campaign and the outcome has the potential to seal voters' impressions of the main contenders.

Conversely, a surprise performance by one of the leaders could shake loose votes and set the tone for an election that already has a high degree of unpredictability.

All the while, because the major TV networks did not broadcast the full debate, it's still unclear how many people watched it (either on TV or online).

The debate was moderated by Maclean's political editor Paul Wells and focused on four broad themes: The economy; energy and the environment; democratic institutions; and foreign affairs.

After debating the economy, the leaders had a heated debate about their party's policies on climate change and oil pipelines.

In recent days, the leaders rehearsed intensely for the debate at City-TV's studio in downtown Toronto.

In the opening days of the campaign, Harper — who is seeking a fourth consecutive mandate — has appealed to voters to opt for the status quo. He has argued that only his party is able to manage the economy, spur tax hikes, and protect Canadians from jihadist terrorists.

Mulcair, enjoying a surge in popularity that has his party leading in the polls, is promising a fiscally responsible government that creates jobs and establishes a national child-care scheme.

At a campaign event in Toronto on Thursday hours before the debate, Mulcair blasted the Tories' economic record.

"Mr. Harper has given us eight deficits in a row, $150 billion in new debt... and he's got one of the worst job-creation records in Canadian history," Mulcair told Trudeau, who is campaigning on a platform of tax cuts and child-care benefits for the middle class.

Trudeau began the day in Toronto within a photo-op at a boxing ring — a move designed to evoke memories of how he put on the gloves in 2012 for a charity and ousted then-senator Patrick Brazeau in the ring.

The timing of the debate, so early in the campaign, is highly unusual. Normally, the leaders don't have to worry about being on the same platform with their rivals until midway through the race.

Harper's Conservatives broke that tradition this election by refusing to appear on four TV debates that had been proposed by a consortium of networks that ensured the matches would be viewed by millions of voters.

Instead, Harper has agreed to appear on only five debates — three English, and two French — and the other main leaders have also agreed.

The music of Canadian composer R. Murray Schafer has the power to transform.

Just after daybreak on Thursday morning, it subtly altered the acoustic landscape around Tom Patterson Island, momentarily turning an immaculate Stratford park system into a remote wilderness setting.

The early morning rehearsal of Schafer at Dawn, featuring a choir of some 50 amateur choristers, along with TorQ Percussion Quartet and soprano Brooke Dufon, was a delightful teaser for what's to come.

Stratford residents and guests will have the chance to enjoy three consecutive free performances of the work as part of the 15th season of Stratford Summer Music.

They run Friday, Saturday and Sunday at 7 a.m.

Guests, who are advised to bring lawnchairs to avoid a heavy dew, will be treated to a uniquely Canadian experience.

"Here I am at the rehearsal, and I'm feeling moved," said Stratford Summer Music artistic producer Canadian composing legend R. Murray Schafer listens to a rehearsal of his work Schafer at Dawn on Tom Patterson Island on Thursday.

John Miller.

"This is the man who expresses Canada. It's the nature that's in us, as Canadians. He's caught that in a way you wouldn't find a composer in another country capturing that."

"He's interpreting Canada."

Schafer, a much-awarded composer who recently received the Companion of the Order of Canada, said he hopes the performances appeal to listeners while perhaps offering a sense of identity.

Indeed, it's unlikely anyone can hear his work without feeling a sense of its roots.

At any given moment in the performance, human voices mimic flocks of wildfowl, while shimmering percussion evokes gentle breezes on a northern lake, far removed from civilization.

"We have a very big identity, a world-wide identity," Schafer said. "So we have to give that identity some kind of an acoustical attachment, so that we can 'hear' Canada. And that's exactly what happens, I think, on a day like today."

"You can see that we're trying to blend ourselves into nature, so that the sounds we make are the same sounds that nature produces back to us."

"So we have this kind of game, backward and forward. It makes a real sort of parlour game between ourselves and our environment."

For choir member Lynn Mitchell, the chance to perform a work by a legendary Canadian composer has been "absolutely wonderful... and a privilege and an honour."

She first became aware of Schafer's work when she was a music student in Toronto in the '70s. His work has left a lifelong impression, she said, and it's a gift to be able to work with him.

"He is a lovely man. For someone who is a legend in his own time, there is no ego."

Meanwhile, a concert featuring the composer's spiritual and sacred works entitled Schafer at Dusk is set for St. James' Anglican Church on Friday night at 10 p.m. Tickets at $40 for that performance are available by calling 519-271-2101 or visiting stratfordsummersmusic.ca.

Artistic producer Miller said welcoming Schafer back was a priority in planning for this season.

"I visited Murray and said this is our 15th anniversary and you have to be here," Miller recalled.

"There's no living composer or Canadian composer who we've featured more than him. He was with us in our first year and has been with us all the way along."

"So, it's incredibly moving for me to have him here. I regard this man as Canada's Bach, Canada's Beethoven."

■ SOD-TURNING EVENT: Construction begins next week

County breaks ground on new EMS headquarters

MIKE BEITZ
Staff Reporter

After plunging a gleaming stainless steel shovel into the ground at the future home of Perth County's new EMS facility in Stratford Thursday, Warden Bob Wilhelm turned to emergency services chief Linda Rockwood and smiled.

"There you go Linda. I did the hard work," he said.

"Actually, getting the vote through county council was the hard part," quipped Stratford Mayor Dan Mathieson, referring to the long and sometimes bumpy road leading to Thursday's sod-turning event.

Construction of the new $4.9-million land ambulance headquarters and EMS base off Douro Street is expected to begin next week after years of planning, and more recently, months of reworking and refining the final building plan.

"It took us a little bit longer, but I think we've got a great project, a great building, a great facility," Rockwood told the gathering of county staff, municipal representatives, paramedics and project partners.

The building will not only support effective deployment and response of EMS staff to the county, Stratford and St. Marys, but will also improve the efficiency and cost-effectiveness of its operations, she added.

"And it's going to support our goals of getting the right resources to the right patients in the right amount of time," said Rockwood, "so we really, really are excited about this project."

Mathieson congratulated the county for taking "such a long-term view, and delivering such a first-class service to our residents and our community along the way."

"This shows real courage in being able to modernize facilities and make the system work," added St. Marys Mayor Al Strathdee on Thursday.

Wilhelm called it an "exciting opportunity."

The goal of this building is to make EMS more effective and efficient in its day-to-day operations," he said, noting that it will consolidate inventory, equipment, education, training, administration and support staff for the department.

The multi-use facility will also meet accessibility standards and post-disaster building standards, and will provide back-up IT infrastruc-structure, additional offices and meeting rooms for county staff.

In the event of a local disaster, it can be converted into a fully functional emergency operations centre.

Rockwood praised the "massive team effort" responsible for balancing design and functionality of the new facility, which will be built by contractor Gateman Milloy, along with NA Engineering and R. Ritz Architect.

"Collectively, we are all doing a happy dance," she said, "because today marks day one of the construction phase."

After a long search for the property, long discussions over the design, and some long debates over the financing, the sod-turning was an "amazing" milestone for Perth County EMS, she said afterward, as participants took turns posing for photos by the patch of upturned grass.

"I said at the beginning I won't believe it until the shovel is in the ground, and it's in the ground, so a big sigh of relief," she said.

The new building is expected to be completed in the spring of 2016.

■ BUSINESS: Sales growth despite slow economy

BCE boosts Q2 income

CHRISTINA PELLEGRINI
Financial Post

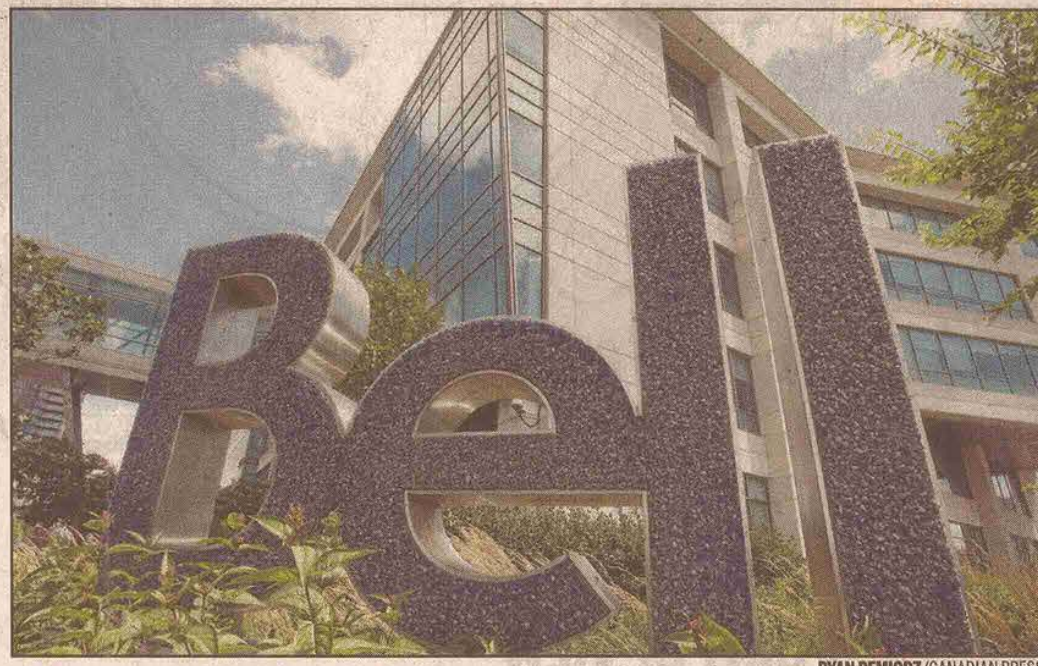

Yet another period of steady, moderate sales growth is giving BCE Inc. the cash it needs to fund the sizable network upgrades it's making in Eastern Canada, which will power a new broadband service, Gigabit Fibe.

The country's largest telco recorded second-quarter results that were largely in line with analyst estimates, posting adjusted net income of $735 million and revenues of $5.3 billion as the company pushed through headwinds such as a sluggish economy, the first few weeks of the double cohort and a "tricky" ecosystem in media. Those were up from $640 million and $5.2 billion, respectively, a year ago.

Bell added a net 61,033 post-paid cellphone subscribers, down from the 67,951 it gained last year, but above the estimated 56,000. "We, again, took market share from the largest wireless carrier in the country," chief executive George Cope boasted in Thursday's earnings call. But Rogers Communications Inc., to its credit, did surprise the Street last month when it said it captured a net 24,000 clients in its own second quarter.

"There's no doubt it was an aggressive last few weeks of the quarter," added Cope, who's bracing for more.

more in recent months to retain, attract and upgrade wireless customers as a burst of untethered users hit the open market on June 3, when some two-year plans and most three-year contracts expired. (This time of flux for the industry has been dubbed the double cohort.)

As a result, BCE saw its churn rate jump 0.08 percentage points from a year ago to 1.23 per cent and retention spending grew to 13 per cent of its $1.5 billion in wireless services revenues, up from 10 per cent in 2014.

While Cope expects BCE will post an additional bump in retention costs during the second half of the year, analysts at RBC Capital Markets reiterated in a note to clients that they "view the pressure as temporary" and "continue to believe the double cohort dynamic remains manageable for BCE and the industry."

In the company's wireline segment, which accounted for close to half of total sales, it's a tale of two stories: consumers, whose thirst to be connected to the latest Internet and TV offerings shows no ceiling; and businesses, which are feeling the financial pinch.

Residential revenue jumped four per cent, driven by continued growth in Bell's Fibe and Bell Aliant's FibreOP. Conversely, the business markets unit slumped. It was attributed to reprising pressure and lower customer spending on service solutions and data products, the latter of which falling 16 per cent.

This performance is reflective of the sluggish economy and slow employment growth we are experiencing in both Central and Atlantic Canada," said Glen LeBlanc, BCE's new chief financial officer.

But Bell's new broadband offering, Gigabit Fibe, will be available in Ontario and Quebec starting Monday to 1.3 million homes, including the recently connected Toronto neighbourhoods of Regent Park, Distillery District, Harbourfront and Willowdale. The company says it can deliver download speeds of as much as a gigabit, or 1,000 megabits, per second. Pricing hasn't been announced.

BCE plans to spend $1.14 billion through the end of 2017 to upgrade and build its fibre optic cable network in Canada's largest city.

Cope said Thursday a long-term agreement with Toronto Hydro gives Bell more access to aerial utility poles that will save the company "north of $200 million" since it allows 70 per cent of the build-out to be done aerially rather than just 50 per cent and the remaining through man-holes.

Barrick tightening belt

ALEXANDRA POSADZKI

TORONTO — Barrick Gold Corp. is selling off some of its mines and cutting its dividend as it works to transform itself into a leaner, more profitable company amid the plummeting price of bullion.

"This is not only about reducing debt," co-president Kelvin Dushnisky told investors during a conference call Thursday. "We want a portfolio focused on high quality gold assets and growth projects in our core regions of the Americas."

The Toronto-based gold miner said Wednesday it will now target spending cuts across its operations at $2 billion before the end of 2016 — double what it had previously announced.

The company said the reductions will come out of its operating expenses, capital spending an corporate overhead and will position it to deliver stronger earnings when gold prices recover.

Barrick, which also reported a second-quarter loss, said it has already identified $1.4 billion of potential cuts across the business.

The company also announced a streaming agreement with Royal Gold, related to Barrick's 60 per cent stake in the Pueblo Viejo mine in the Dominican Republic. Dushnisky said the deal will "strengthen the balance sheet in the short term while preserving material exposure to higher gold and silver prices in the future."

Under the agreement, Barrick will sell a portion of the gold and silver produced at the mine to Royal Gold, in exchange for a $610-million upfront payment as well as ongoing cash payments.

Barrick reported a net loss of $9 million, or one cent per share, compared with a loss of $269 million, or 23 cents, in the same period a year earlier. Sales dropped to $2.23 billion from $2.46 billion.

The company said it will slash its dividend by 60 per cent to two cents per share from the current five cents per share. The company said it's also considering a number of expressions of interest for the purchase of its non-core assets in Nevada and Montana as it anticipates further weakness in the price of gold during the last half of this year.

Gold bullion has lost roughly 40 per cent of its value since 2011, which has left miners scrambling to reduce how much they spend to produce each ounce of the precious metal.

December gold futures closed Wednesday at US$1,085.60 an ounce, down $5.10 from the previous day's close.

Some experts say gold's value may drop further if, as many expect, the U.S. Federal Reserve hikes interest rates this fall. That could prompt investors to ditch safe havens like gold in favour of U.S. dollars.

■ FINANCE: Shares sink 8.42 per cent

SNC-Lavalin Inc. stock tumbles after missing Q2 estimates

DAMON VAN DER LINDE
Financial Post

MONTREAL — Investors reacted negatively Thursday to Quebec construction and engineering giant SNC-Lavalin Group Inc. missing second-quarter estimates in its infrastructure division, although one analyst says this is an overreaction to an isolated problem.

"It looks like it's more of a one-time miss than some sort of structural dynamic," said Maxim Sytchev, head of research at Dundee Capital Markets. "The issue resides in one division and this is infrastructure. Everything else is doing quite well."

Shares sunk $3.68, or 8.42 per cent — the most in three years, according to Bloomberg — to close at $40.05 in Toronto trading after the firm reported earnings 20 per cent lower than the same period last year.

Net income of 17 cents a share lagged the 37-cent average of analyst estimates compiled by Bloomberg.

SNC said this was driven by a pre-tax loss in the infrastructure division caused by difficult soil conditions along a transit tunnel and costs associated with an unnamed major Canadian highway project.

Revenue rose 33 per cent over the second quarter of 2014 to $2.3 billion, and the company reported no change to its core earnings per share guidance of $1.30-$1.60.

"Given the fact that they are telegraphing in-line guidance, that means they should have the visibility to be able to correct that executorial issue," said Sytchev, who maintains a "buy" rating on SNC with a price target of $54.

Several large-scale projects will also soon be reflected in the company's backlog numbers, including the new Champlain bridge in Montreal and Toronto's Eglinton Cross-town project.

Backlog was $12.4 billion at the end of June 2015, compared with $8.2 billion at the end of June 2014 and $12.3 billion at the end of December 2014.

"Right now we have the revenue opportunity to generate margin, but it's up to the company to execute," said Sytchev.

SNC says the backlog increase compared to June 2014 is mainly due to last year's $2.1 billion acquisition of the Kentz Corp. liquefied natural gas operation in Australia.

■ NUHN INDUSTRIES: Sebringville manufacturer celebrates 100th lagoon crawler

Marking a major milestone

LAURA CUDWORTH
Staff Reporter

It's the very definition of a mean machine.

When the tent lifted and the dry ice cleared, the massive machine rolled out onto the floor with AC/DC's Back in Black pumping in the background. It wasn't like any before it. This Nuhn Industries lagoon crawler was the 100th to roll off the line. It was black instead of red, with red lights up the back and silver signatures on the side from all the staff.

The remote-control machine is amphibious. It goes into sewage lagoons, pulls the sludge off the bottom and pumps it onto the land for fertilizer. Looking up at it, it's hard to believe it floats.

It's the end product of a lot of hard work, dedication and brilliant design—all of which starts and ends at the Sebringville business.

Less than two years ago, Ian Nuhn, vice-president of Nuhn Industries, was only 23 years old and thinking about what customers were saying they needed. Exactly what they wanted didn't exist — at least, not yet.

To pull nutrients out of lagoons, farmers were using pumps that spray more water than nutrients from the bottom and don't provide the same consistent application of fertilizer to the land. Nuhn said clients have told him if they had to go back to using the pumps, they'd quit.

"We've made a hard task really easy."

It's all very practical, but it's also really cool. For anyone who has ever had, or wanted, a remote-control anything this is a dream come true — it's a futuristic, jacked-up, amphibious machine on steroids.

"We started with a blank computer screen. Ten days later, we built a fully-working prototype," Nuhn said.

SCOTT WISHART/THE BEACON HERALD

With the company's 100th lagoon crawler in the background, Nuhn Industries' vice-president Ian Nuhn speaks to a crowd of guests at a lunchtime celebration at the Sebringville firm on Thursday.

The main market is in the United States, but the machines have been sent all over the world, including shipments to Russia and China.

Before that happened, there was a lot of "blood, sweat and tears, literally" to get it right.

"I've grown very attached to it. It's not just about the 100th. It's all the times the prototype broke down, all the hours designing and building and digging deeper. That's what that 100th means."

They took it to a farm show and sold 10 right out of the gate. They've also won international innovation awards.

By January 2014, they were in production. They stopped making tanks and pumps temporarily to focus on the crawler. Back then, Nuhn and his father, Denis Nuhn, the company president, couldn't have predicted the 100th would roll off the line the following year.

"I knew we had something. I thought we would be lucky to do 20 units a year," Nuhn said. "To do 100 in a year and a half, I couldn't believe we'd be here."

"I'm proud of what 85 guys in the middle of Sebringville can create." Nuhn would like to keep the 100th, but clients have heard about a special-edition black model with red lights and want to know how to get one.

In addition to the lagoon-crawler milestone, the company is also celebrating a significant expansion. Nuhn Industries has been growing at a rate of about 40 per cent for the past three or four years, Nuhn said. Since they first conceived of the crawler, about 30 new employees have come on board, bringing the staff numbers up to 85.

To accommodate the upswing in business, Nuhn needed more room as well, so it's gone from 6,131 square metres (66,000 square feet) to about 9,290 square metres (100,000 square feet).

■ PERTH COUNTY: Councillors reverse decision to defer

Council moving ahead with public works garage

MIKE BEITZ
Staff Reporter

Despite concerns about adding to the county's debt-load, Perth County council agreed Thursday to move forward with a new $2.1-million public works garage in Mitchell.

Councillors had voted last month to defer the approval of a tender for the Napier Street facility, which would replace the one that was heavily damaged by fire in 2013, largely because of the cost involved.

The low bid by Domm Construction was $466,000 above what the county had budgeted for the project.

After agreeing to reconsider the motion to approve Domm's bid, council replayed the debate it had in July, with some members balking at the additional cost, and others resigned to it.

"Yes, they might need building, but I have a real problem with awarding a contract that's almost a half a million dollars over budget to someone, just because," said Coun. Rhonda Egoetz.

She suggested earlier that the county was partly to blame for the additional cost, because it put the project out to tender too late in the season.

Council had discussed retendering the project at a later date in hopes of getting a better price. The additional cost above the budgeted amount is something the county simply can't afford, suggested Coun. Julie Behrns.

"At the end of the day, someone is still going to pay for it," she said. "Especially when you're borrowing money, you may think it's only $460,000 more, but by the time that debt is paid, it's a whole lot more than that."

But Coun. Walter McKenzie argued that the cost difference had more to do with the weak Canadian dollar, which makes construction materials purchased from the U.S. significantly more expensive.

Retendering the project in the winter won't guarantee a better price, he added.

"It is what it is," he said. "It's unfortunate we couldn't have done this two years ago right after the building burned."

"We have to move forward," added Coun. Doug Kellum, who initiated the motion for council to reconsider the issue Thursday.

"We have to think about our kids and grandkids down the road as well, but we also have to think about future councils and future employees."

Council approved a motion to authorize an agreement with Domm Construction for $2.1 million (plus HST) for the design-build contract for the new public works garage.

■ FRYFOGEL TAVERN

Step back in time

BEACON HERALD STAFF

All are welcome to the first annual ancestors' picnic and fundraiser at Fryfogel Tavern and Arboretum this Saturday from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m.

Tours, games and demonstrations will be part of the event, being held at the historic tavern located just east of Shakespeare on Highway 7/8.

Guest can try their hand at pioneer games, watch stepdancing performances and enjoy a tour of the arboretum and heritage garden led by a horticultural expert, a release from the Stratford Perth

Heritage Foundation said.

Stratford chef Ben Uniac will prepare light snacks while volunteers in the Tavern tea room will serve tea and treats. Events are free, with food offered at a reasonable price or by donation for the tea service, the release added.

A silent auction is part of the event, as well, with items donated by businesses in Stratford and across Perth County.

A scavenger hunt is planned for noon. All proceeds from the event support the ongoing restoration work of Fryfogel.

POLICE BRIEF

OPP investigate SUV theft

The Perth County OPP are investigating the theft of an SUV from a rural residence near Arboretum Wednesday. It marks the 16th reported vehicle theft in the county this year, OPP said.

"The majority of these stolen vehicles had been left unlocked and most had the keys either left in the ignition, or hidden under the floor mat, behind the visor or in a cup holder," OPP said in a release. In this incident, the vehicle was unlocked, with keys inside, in an unlocked garage, police said. After seeing the vehicle leave the driveway, the resident noticed a different vehicle was left behind. That turned out to be a 2014

Ford Explorer reported stolen from a residence near Hesson early Tuesday morning.

The missing vehicle is described as a brown 2011 Chevrolet Equinox with Ontario plate 347YTW.

Citing Insurance Bureau of Canada statistics, OPP said that about half of all stolen vehicles get used to commit another crime or driven, often recklessly, for transportation.

"It may sound repetitive, but owners should take that extra care in securing their motor vehicles," said Inspector Steve Porter of Perth County OPP.

"Roll up your vehicle's windows, lock the doors and pocket the keys. If we make this a habit, I am certain that we will see a decrease in these preventable motor vehicle thefts." Anyone with information about the incident is asked to call Perth County OPP at 1-888-310-1122 or Crime Stoppers at 1-800-222-8477.

Sixteen-year-old Caroline Smith knows the surgery might kill her and cost her dad every cent he has.

But those are risks the Oxford County team will take in two weeks to escape a life where friends shun her, doctors dismiss her and Ontario health ministers have left her and others to suffer with a rare disorder that can cause bones to dislocate at the slightest touch.

"I can't have (any) physical contact... I can't risk my neck being injured in any way. If I pick up something wrong, I could dislocate my wrist or my thumb," she said this week.

Smith, from Princeton, near Woodstock, has a condition that weakens connective tissue like ligaments that bind bones. Ehlers-Danlos syndrome affects one in 5,000, only some of whom suffer the worst symptoms.

The toll on the teen has been immense: horrendous pain, limbs that pop out of their sockets, bowels she can no longer control, blood pressure that drops so she passes out and a spine so fragile a small blow to the neck might leave her a paraplegic.

Last year alone, Smith went about 200 times to emergency rooms and doctors, but it's her next appointment that's critical and expensive: A Maryland surgeon and facility will charge $100,000 to fuse a bone to her neck Aug. 20 to support a spinal cord that no longer safely supports her head.

Smith's father Bruce, who's looked after her as a single parent the past three years, isn't wealthy. He doesn't own a home, and while he works in a scrapyard, he's seeking help from friends and strangers because the Health Ministry hasn't agreed to pay for surgery outside Ontario.

"It hurts to watch her, how much pain she's in... We came in to the emergency one day... with her crying, saying 'I'm not crazy,' and the doctor, calling a psychiatrist, saying she is. This is basically how she's been treated the last three of four years," Smith said.

She's not alone in misery. About 100 Ontarians have Ehlers-Danlos, with about 20 with symptoms so severe their lives are consumed seeking help from doctors who don't know what to do, said Darren Crawford, whose 19-year-old daughter Erika has undergone two American surgeries at a cost of $185,000.

"(Some) neurosurgeons here have such big egos, they say, 'I'll don't know about it, it doesn't exist,'" Crawford said.

For Caroline Smith, though, one doctor has been a godsend — London pediatrician Tony D'Souza, who started a practice here after forming and leading the pediatric emergency department at McMaster University Children's Hospital.

In the face of several obstacles, D'Souza has been fighting for a teenager he calls determined and vibrant. Each time he sees her, she gets worse and worse. "The neck issue is pressing," he said. "Could she die? I don't know."

DEADLY SYNDROME, LACK OF CARE

■ Ehlers-Danlos syndrome damages connective tissues that support the skin, bones, blood vessels, and other organs. Symptoms vary from mild to life-threatening.

■ A leading pediatrician can't find any surgeon in Ontario who will operate on those who need potentially life-saving neck surgery.

■ An American surgeon has done 2,000 operations on those with the syndrome but Ontario's Health Ministry refuses to pay.

■ Ontario Health Minister Eric Hoskins promised action more than two weeks ago but families of patients say he's giving them the runaround.

HOW TO HELP

■ To help Caroline Smith: <http://www.gofundme.com/caroline-smith>

■ To sign online petition asking Ontario to pay for care out of province: <https://goo.gl/Q3FAZL>

OBSTACLES

London pediatrician Tony D'Souza has tried to find Caroline Smith help in Ontario, an effort that has led instead to dead ends. Among them:

■ Neurosurgeons know too little about Ehlers-Danlos.

■ Many doctors dismiss her problems as something else.

■ A specialist says the teen must wait nine months just to consult him.

■ Ontario's Health Ministry won't consider paying for surgery outside Ontario unless a specialist requests it.

■ Hospitals don't know how to do MRI scans on those with Ehlers-Danlos and have refused to learn.

As for Bruce Smith, there's no way he'd allow an Ontario surgeon to cut open his daughter without having extensive experience doing spinal surgery on patients with Ehlers-Danlos.

"(I'm not going) to trust someone from here (to) use her as a guinea pig," Smith said.

Caroline Smith leaves for Maryland Aug. 18 and will have surgery two days later — Henderson required an initial payment of just $20,000 so the operation wouldn't be delayed.

While there is speedy treatment south of the border, governing Liberals in Ontario won't pay.

"These cases are heartbreaking," then Ontario health minister Deb Matthews said in September 2012.

Three years later, the Health Ministry is still fighting the Crawfords from getting reimbursed for the $190,000 spent on Erika's surgeries, and Matthews' successor, Eric Hoskins, is dodging questions and calls for help.

Seventeen days ago, in the face of criticism from families and media, Hoskins issued a statement, writing his ministry had identified specialists who would decide the best course of care here or outside the province.

"I have asked my ministry officials to connect families to these physicians to ensure that patients are receiving the care they need."

But more than two weeks later, no one from the ministry had contacted the Smiths or the Crawfords. When The Free Press pressed Hoskins to provide the list of specialists, he refused, writing in an e-mail that doctors' names must be kept confidential.

Asked how many spinal surgeries had been done in Ontario on patients with Ehlers-Danlos, and what the complication and mortality rates had been, Hoskins ignored the question.

"We would encourage (patients) to contact the ministry for assistance at 613-536-3123 and ministry staff will connect them with a specialist who can determine the appropriate course of care for them," Hoskins wrote.

But when the Smiths and Crawfords each phoned that number, bureaucrat Bev Lyman refused to disclose doctors' names.

It was only after The Free Press pushed Hoskins for answers that Lyman sent by courier letters to families. Only referring doctors, and not families, will get a list of specialists, she wrote.

"It's a runaround," Erika's mother Michelle Crawford said Thursday.

Many people have done much to help Caroline Smith, her father says.

But those efforts aren't enough and Caroline Smith is left to imagine a health-care system in Ontario where patients like her would be helped with care and compassion.

"Children should never have to go through being (called) crazy," she said. "They (shouldn't) have to randomly become a millionaire to afford (treatment)."

Harper promised to be different; he hasn't been

I will serve Prime Minister Stephen Harper right if the Canadians whose votes he is trying to buy through political pork barrelling across the country refuse to stay bought.

After all, by betting almost $1.2 billion of taxpayers' money in one day last week on local capital improvement projects that flooded into mainly Conservative ridings just before the election call, the Tories have made clear they believe the votes of Canadians can be purchased.

All they're really arguing over now is the price.

The unseemly spectacle has appropriately been dubbed pork-a-palooza by Sun Parliamentary Bureau Chief David Akin, who counted 84 cheques valued at $839 million sent to Conservative ridings last Thursday alone, shortly before the writ dropped, after which such announcements can no longer be made.

That compares to $68.6 million earmarked for Liberal ridings and $53.8 million in NDP ridings, with the rest going to national programs.

You can find a list of the grants and what they're ostensibly to be used for in the July 31 entry of Akin's political blog.

Yes, the Liberals used to do the same thing when they were in power from 1993 to 2006, but that's no excuse.

Harper came into power promising to end Liberal political corruption — of which pork-barrelling is one component — not double down on it.

The federal government can have a legitimate role to play in funding capital projects in communities across Canada, such as needed improvements to wastewater treatment, seniors centres, high-speed Internet access, even fixing up Legion Halls and recreational facilities.

But rushing cheques out the door just as the writ is about to be dropped, not on the basis of priority and need but rather mainly on which ridings voted Conservative in the last election, is a disgrace.

It lowers the chances the spending will be done properly and increases the chances the work may not be necessary, if the government was simply trying to find Conservative ridings on which to shower money at the eleventh hour.

What it proves, as do numerous other examples, is that political corruption isn't a function of being a Conservative or a Liberal, the NDP never having not yet won a federal election. It's a function of time spent in power.

Inevitably, the leaders and parties who come to power promising to clean up the political corruption of the previous regime — as Jean Chretien promised when he replaced Brian Mulroney and Kim Campbell, and Harper promised when he replaced Chretien and Paul Martin — do the very things they once blasted their opponents for doing.

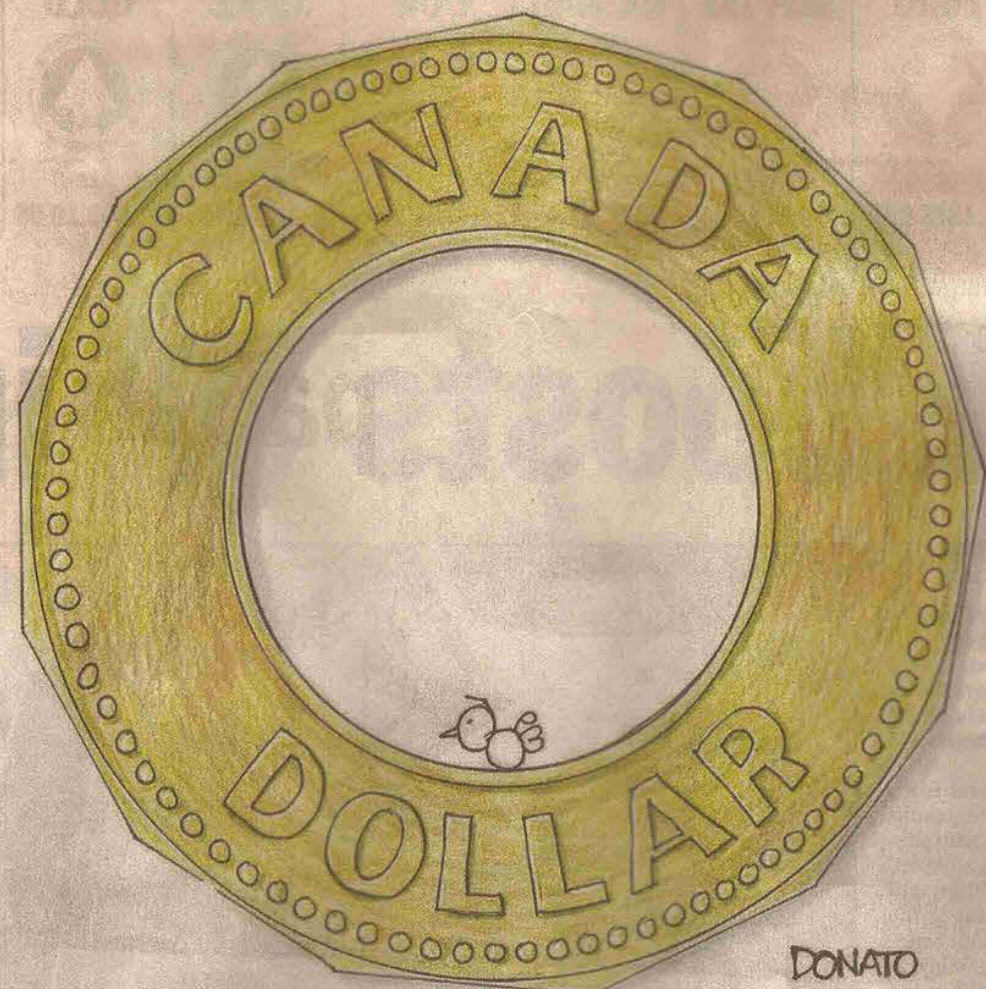

Ethics and morality are easy when one is in opposition, removed from the levers of power — although heaven knows opposition parties these days commit serious breaches as well.

But the true test of a party's morality comes when it enters government and the seduction of power, patronage and limousines contends with the two most important attributes a political leader can have — good judgment and common sense.

The point here isn't that Justin Trudeau and the Liberals don't have a moral leg to stand on when it comes to attacking the Conservatives on pork-barrelling, given their own history.

It's that Harper promised to do politics differently, and he isn't.

NEW ISSUE

POINT OF VIEW

Rail rules update welcome, not enough

Transport Canada took another step last week toward preventing future railway tragedies such as the one in Lac-Mégantic.

The announcement of a permanent update to Rule 112 of the Canadian Railway Operating Rules, which clarifies when and how trains carrying dangerous materials must be secured before being left unattended, is significant.

Essentially, it formalizes an emergency directive issued in 2013, shortly after an unattended freight train carrying crude oil rolled down a hill into Lac-Mégantic and exploded, killing 47 people. As of Oct. 14, railway employees must adhere permanently to a table that outlines how many handbrakes should be set before a train can be left unattended, taking into account both its weight and the incline on which it is parked.

Handbrakes are designed to keep the train immobile should the main air brake system fail, which is what happened in the hours leading up to the Lac-Mégantic accident.

This is good news, but there is still reason for concern.

Updated Rule 112 requires the train operator to confirm with "another employee" that the proper procedures were followed, but says nothing about the training or knowledge the second employee must possess. A similar update to American regulations, also announced last week, requires this second opinion come from someone who is qualified to provide it. Rule 112 should be amended to say the same.

Meanwhile, the phasing in of more resistant tanker cars with shields on both ends, reinforced valves, thermal protection and thicker hulls is not expected to be complete until 2025. While the gradual replacement of the weaker DOT-111 cars is sorely needed, the new models are not immune to rupture. Two recent derailments in Northern Ontario proved this, with the stronger cars torn apart by the sheer violence of the incidents.

Transport Canada cannot ignore the other factors in play, which include the speed of trains, the condition of the tracks, and the maintenance of equipment. The department has recently introduced a 64-km/h speed limit for urban areas with more than 100,000 residents, and brought on 10 additional inspectors. But with the volume of crude oil being moved by rail still ballooning, more manpower will surely be needed.

With each incremental change to outdated regulations and standards, the Canadian government proves it is taking rail safety seriously. This vigilance must continue and any gaps must be identified and quickly closed.

More than ever, news coverage is the campaign

A tone of the late rallies in last year's Ontario election campaign, Tim Hudak, then the leader of the Progressive Conservatives, had a rally in a big room at the Nepean Sportsplex. They used drapes to cut the space down to about one-third its actual size so people would be lined up out the door.

The Tories were attempting to follow a basic rule of political stagecraft. That is, however many people you're expecting, book a room slightly too small. You want to look as though you're totally taken aback by how many people your bandwagon is picking up.

When Liberal Leader Kathleen Wynne first hit Ottawa on that campaign, she spoke in a storefront campaign office that forced more people than fit in the building to strain to hear from outside.

When you see the federal leaders or local candidates on TV during the next 11 weeks, they're not speaking at huge rallies, they're speaking at events designed for news viewers, in which the real live people with them are props. We know this, but it's easy to forget: The "campaign" is in the coverage, not in the events themselves.

At his first Toronto-area event of the current campaign in Ajax, Prime Minister Stephen Harper spoke with multiple rows of supporters behind him. Politicians do this a lot: it gives them a mobile, active backdrop and gives the impression that the room is so crowded they've had to seat people on the stage.

Harper has had more and more success as a campaigner the more tightly he has controlled his audiences and appearances, and in this campaign the Conservatives have turned their rallies into ticketed events. You can't just hear that the Tory leader's in town and go see what he has to say.

"Friends," he begins many of his sentences, and it's not just a figure of speech. You need to be a loyalist just to get in the door, to limit even the possibility of heckling or other nasty surprises. Liberal Leader Justin Trudeau, meanwhile, kind of likes surprises because he handles them deftly. They create the kinds of moments you can't fake, for better or for worse.

He wants to look like he's at the head of an irresistible movement, like his father in 1968 or U.S. President Barack Obama in 2008.

When Trudeau hit Mississauga on Tuesday, he attracted a remarkable number of people to an outdoor rally before 8 a.m. after a long weekend. It sure looked good. Yet a remarkable number of those people are on Liberal payroll, as people such as Wynne's press secretary and MPP Yasir Naqvi's communications director at Queen's Park.

They're citizens like anybody else and they can do whatever they want before work. But they also owe the man a favour, what with his lending his efforts to Wynne's 2014 re-election campaign even when winning wasn't at all a sure thing. He helped them keep their jobs, and getting up early to bulk up Trudeau's numbers is small payback.

At least they're real Liberal supporters. Some politicians have been known to hire crowds for these things.

Tom Mulcair, leader of the New Democrats, is taking a different tact, striving to appear not like a popular party leader but like someone who's already prime minister.

First he welcomed the beginning of the campaign before a microphone at the Museum of History, the grandest perspective of Parliament behind him.

His next appearance was on Mount Royal, backed by New Democrat candidates, again speaking directly to the people of Canada, not to anyone physically in front of him.

He'd promised an announcement but there wasn't one, beyond a summary of the things the NDP stands for, an invocation of Jack Layton and a lot of talk about what "our government" will do. Just as if he were already running the place.

grade to grade or from school to school in the so-called "turkey trot."

Finally, principals will encourage their best teachers to teach the most difficult students. No longer will excellent teachers spend on time to bargain with administrators to obtain the best classes, leaving the most difficult students for inexperienced colleagues.

Stratford Tennis League champions crowned

BEACON HERALD STAFF

The 2015 Stratford Tennis League champions have been crowned.

Auto Works, who finished fourth in the regular season standings but caught fire in the playoffs, took the 'A' championship.

Auto Works faced Donkers Agri in the final, Play opened with Auto Works' No. 1 ladies doubles team of Johanna Billings and Deb Murphy sweeping Linda Doig and Maria Donkers 6-2, 6-4. The No. 2 ladies doubles split sets as Donkers team of Lindsay Murray and Nancy Chung took the first set 7-5 before Auto Works' Carmen Miron and Sandra Hofing responded by taking the second set 6-4.

The No. 1 men's doubles had Richard East and John Noble of Donkers win the first set 6-2, and Grant McPherson and Pat McCarroll of Auto Works rebounding to take the second set 6-4. The No. 2 men's doubles also saw a split of sets as Larry Shurrie and Mike Schiedel won the first set for Donkers 6-4, 7-6 (7-5). There was a split of sets in the No. 2 men's doubles as Ryan Lay and Landon Hoare of Snapp won the first set 7-6 (7-3), while Jared Larder and Wayne Carney of Sunrise took the second set 6-4.

The mixed doubles opened with Ennett and Fischer of Sunrise scoring a 6-3 victory over Weernink and Parson in the No. 1 match. The No. 2 mixed doubles match went to Sunrise as Lange and Coates took out Wensink and Schiedel 6-2. Eickmeyer and Lay won the No. 3 mixed doubles for Snapp by edging Leasa and Larder 7-5. The No. 4 mixed doubles went to Sunrise as Holmes and Carney scored a 6-1 win over Mowbray and Hoare.

The 7-5 sets victory gave the 'B' championship to Sunrise Health Services.

Auto Works won the match and 'A' championship with a close 7-5 sets victory to complete their impressive playoff run.

Earlier in the evening the 'B' championship match was played with Sunrise Health Services facing Snapp, Sunrise opened with a sweep of the No. 1

Jays sweep Twins, Yankees up next

RYAN WOLSTADT

Postmedia Network

TORONTO — Look out Yankees. There's a runaway blue and white freight train barreling its way to the Bronx.

The Blue Jays won for the eighth time in nine games on Thursday and fifth straight overall, 9-3 over the Twins, setting up a huge three-game set at Yankee Stadium starting Friday.

Building off of a series win over Kansas City, the Jays ran Minnesota out of town, its first four-game series sweep at the Rogers Centre since 2009.

The deadliest offence in the majors pummeled the Twins yet again, led by Edwin Encarnacion (three hits and four RBIs, including a home run), Ben Revere (three-for-four with three runs scored) and Troy Tulowitzki (two more hits).

Mark Buehrle delivered his latest in a long line of snappy starts, allowing just three runs and five hits in seven innings, though he and manager John Gibbons made it clear Buehrle didn't have his best stuff. Homers to Trevor Plouffe (a two-run shot in the fourth that cut the lead to 4-2 and Aaron Hicks were the only two major blemishes on Buehrle's night.

"It wasn't one of my best nights, I didn't feel the greatest, but you're going to have those starts over the course of the year," Buehrle said.

Still, the 36-year-old, who started 2014 at 10-1, before dropping his next six decisions, improved to 12-5 and the Jays moved to 13-6 since the All-Star break, outscoring opponents 101-63.

Bo Scholtz mopped up with two scoreless, hitless innings in relief.

Buehrle said the Jays are oozing confidence.

"The city is buzzing. The clubhouse is here, you've got that feel every day when you come to the field, 'Who's next?' No matter if it's a nookie pitching or a guy that's been around for a while, you've got that feel of, 'Whose butt are we going to kick today?' Buehrle said.

"There's just a different feeling. I felt the same way in '05 when we won the World Series (with the Chicago White Sox)," Buehrle said. "There were times when we'd be down two runs in the seventh inning and it was like, 'We don't care, we're going to win this game,' somehow we're going to find a way to win this game, and we do."

While the pitching has come together (Toronto's starters are in a quality starts groove not seen in years, and the bullpen has been the best in the American League in recent weeks) it's Toronto's dynamic offense that remains must-see entertainment — unless you are an opposing pitcher or manager.

Only two Jays starters failed to collect a hit and Revere had his second multi-hit game in a row after going 0-for-13 in his first four outings as a Blue Jays.

The speedster, who led the National League in hits a year ago, has added a pesky contact hitter with lightning wheels to the bottom of the lineup, which mixes with the thunder that sits just behind him later in games quite well.

Twins veteran Torii Hunter is impressed.

"There aren't too many teams going to beat that team over there," Hunter said from the visiting clubhouse after the game.

"They've got a great squad. They way they hit the ball is just unbelievable. When they hit the ball, it sounds like car crashes."

The Jays repeatedly punished Twins starter Kyle Gibson, eventually chasing him after 4.2 innings after scoring eight earned runs on nine hits, successfully keeping their focus on the Jays, even with the massive series with the Yankees looming.

The Jays were the total package on this night, with the defence also excelling at times, most notably when Kevin Pillar added to his highlight reel with another brilliant diving catch in centre field to end the eighth inning and when Donaldson flashed the leather a couple of times to make strong plays at the hot corner.

All the pieces are coming together for this club at just the right time, though there remains considerable work to be done.

for two months and hopefully longer. That's my objective, to get this behind me and worry about plate and tossed Sanchez."

Sanchez started his three-game suspension Wednesday and will be able to return Saturday afternoon for the second game of the weekend series at Yankee Stadium.

Plate ump Jim Wolf had issued warnings in the first inning Sunday and when Sanchez entered in relief in the top of the eighth, told him about the warnings.

With two out his pitch hit Escobar on the knee. With great theatrics Wolf walked in front of the plate and tossed Sanchez. The Jays said Wednesday Sanchez would not be available to work Wednesday as he had pitched four times in six days. Sanchez said he had been given two days off. The fear from the Jays' end is that the ruling could come Friday and he would miss all three games in New York.

The Jays have a seven-man bullpen without Sanchez.

WORLD JUNIOR CAMP

Younger players 'class of skill'

TERRY KOSHAN

Postmedia Network

Skill and depth. Those words come to mind when one glances at the group of forwards Canada has the potential to put on the ice at the 2016 world junior championship.

The question for Hockey Canada director of player personnel Ryan Jankowski and the staff is how the forwards eventually will break down once the final 22-player roster is set following the selection camp in December.

Of the 24 forwards who were invited to the summer development camp, 15 were born in 1996, with nine born in 1997. Usually, it's the 19-year-olds who provide a foundation at the world junior. But the 18-year-old group should include Mitch Marner and Dylan Strome, a couple of players who lit up the Ontario Hockey League last season while much of the focus was centred on Connor McDavid and then went to be top-four NHL draft picks.

"The 1997s are the high-calibre class of skill," Jankowski said. "The '96 group, we have had a bunch of really good soldier-type players. It's going to be interesting to see how it meshes."

"I think we are going to be a little younger than we were last year."

Provided head coach Dave Lowry takes 13 forwards to the tournament in Helsinki, with a Dec. 26 date with the United States marking Canada's opening game, it could be that four spots are spoken for. Robby Fabbri, Brayden Point, Jake

LYLE ASPINWALL/POSTMEDIA NETWORK

London Knights' Mitch Marner lit up the OHL last season, while much of the spotlight was focused on Connor McDavid.

Virtanen and Lawson Crouse played on the team that won gold in 2015, and barring injury, an unexpected setback in their play or the earning of a roster spot in the National Hockey League, it's difficult to imagine any of them being cut. Fabbri and Point would be offensive catalysts in Finland.

What's clear is there will be no straying from the philosophy that helped Canada end a five-year dry spell without a gold. Skill will be the way to go, with exact roles to be determined.

"We felt in the past, at times, that we had cut our depth in half," Jankowski said. "We did not have enough skill on the third and fourth lines to create. When we brought in guys specifically for a fourth line, they were not good enough, when you needed a goal, they could not play."

Indications from the summer development camp as it progressed this week were encouraging. None of the forwards had to be told that competition for jobs would be stiff. There was an effort level that was appreciated in the first week of August as many players have been itching to get out of the gym.

There was the recognition that leaving a good first impression with Jankowski and Lowry was paramount.

"With the exception of the Olympic team, the world junior team is probably the hardest team to make," John Queeneyville said. "We split the squads up and we still had so many good players on either side. But it was also fun to play alongside all of these guys."

Said Marner: "No one was taking anything for granted." No less than 11 forwards in camp finished in the top 20 in scoring in their respective leagues last season. And we can't forget that at least a couple of players who did not get invited will perform well enough in the first few months of the 2015-16 season to earn a spot at the selection camp.

Sanchez maintains innocence

BOB ELLIOTT

Postmedia Network

TORONTO — Aaron Sanchez dropped his three-game appeal but not his plea of innocence.

Sanchez was fitted for a set of Major League Baseball suspenders to wear for three days for intentionally hitting Kansas City Royals' Alcides Escobar on Sunday at the Rogers Centre.

"This way made sense," Sanchez said told reporters Thursday. "I want this behind me. I've got 24 other guys to fight with for two months and hopefully longer. That's my objective, to get this behind me and worry about plate and tossed Sanchez."

Sanchez started his three-game suspension Wednesday and will be able to return Saturday afternoon for the second game of the weekend series at Yankee Stadium.

Plate ump Jim Wolf had issued warnings in the first inning Sunday and when Sanchez entered in relief in the top of the eighth, told him about the warnings.

With two out his pitch hit Escobar on the knee. With great theatrics Wolf walked in front of the plate and tossed Sanchez. The Jays said Wednesday Sanchez would not be available to work Wednesday as he had pitched four times in six days. Sanchez said he had been given two days off. The fear from the Jays' end is that the ruling could come Friday and he would miss all three games in New York.

The Jays have a seven-man bullpen without Sanchez.

YOUR HOROSCOPE

BY EUGENIA LAST

Good fortune will be yours if you are diligent and push to get ahead professionally. Your ability to learn on the spot and to adapt to whatever changes occur around you will help you remain in the game. Personal changes that are geared toward self-improvement are encouraged and will help build your confidence as well as your reputation. Your numbers are 2, 10, 18, 25, 32, 36, 41.

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Set up interviews or check out online job postings. You'll make a good impression if you send out your resume or discuss what you have to offer based on your past experiences. Romance and making personal living changes are encouraged.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Put your efforts into making your home comfortable and welcoming. Entertain friends, but don't go over budget. Get everyone to pitch in and help. Your ability to make someone feel at ease will allow you to discuss sensitive issues.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Ask questions if you feel someone is withholding information. Your ability to get others to share secrets will help you make decisions that will influence your future. Changes to your home or where you live are encouraged.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Let your beliefs, talents and skills speak for themselves. Show everyone what you can do, but don't brag or exaggerate. The proof is in the results you get. Stand up and do your best.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Look at your job options. Don't limit yourself to a geographical location. Sometimes moving to where the action is professionally is the best answer. Send out your resume and prepare to negotiate. A past partner will influence your decision.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Keep your distance from anyone who puts demands on you. Take care of your own business first before you take on something that has absolutely no benefits for you. Don't let an emotional matter lead to a mishap.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Offer to help others. Giving your time and attention to a cause may not please the people close to you, but the satisfaction you get will be worth your while. An instant connection to someone you encounter will influence your future.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Don't wait for others to make a move. Emotional problems could develop with your colleagues or potential employers if you aren't careful. Back up and take a moment to sort out your feelings and consider how to best move forward.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Run a checklist before you vocalize your intentions. You have to keep everything in its place or someone will object or criticize you. Put your feelings on the table and extend an invitation to share your life goals.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): A proposal to get involved in a joint venture won't be as good as you anticipate. Before you give the go-ahead, rethink the outcome and prepare for any possible problems that might arise. Protect your money, possessions and investments.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): You'll meet opposition if you try to push your ideas on others. Do your best to go it alone and present what you have done only after you are finished. The setbacks you'll encounter will not be worth the aggravation.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Time spent with an old friend or visiting places you used to frequent will bring back fond memories. Consider reviving an old idea or starting a new partnership with the potential to bring in extra cash. Consider starting a small, home-based business.
