When it comes to Web video, short clips under three minutes still make up the vast majority of what people watch. But as the quality of video improves, more people will be willing to sit and watch streams of half-hour sitcoms, hour-long dramas, and maybe even entire movies. Already, there is some anecdotal evidence of this shift.

Move Networks—which powers the media players and back-end streaming infrastructure for ABC, ESPN360, Fox On-Demand, and the Discovery Channel—released the following data today for videos streamed from all its customers' Websites collectively:

- So far in November, more than 100,000 new individuals are watching long-form video (anything 20 minutes or over) online each day, twice as many as in August.
- In November, the average session length is more than 50 minutes.
- In October 2007, more than 6 million people watched long form streaming video online.
- Since March 2007, Move has streamed almost 50 million hours of television.

These numbers still pale compared to actual TV, but as the growth continues they will start to attract even more advertising dollars than they do already.

I use long-form video all the time. ABC, CBS, NBC, FOX. Works very well for me. Don't have cable or even normal TV reception.

To anyone that is jaded about the poor quality of online video, try the discovery channel full episode viewer. Amazingly good. Cable quality.

The only downside is that you can't pause, or fast forward (and the selection is limited). But, good trend.

More than gaining viewers it seems to me that it's gaining content. Count me another without cable or TV reception.

Yeah with this set up here (this is not spam just sharing) <http://www.techavid.com/internetTV.php> I am more then happy just to pay $40 for Internet and use it for what I was paying $120 for cable TV, phone and Internet before.

Thru time more and more consumers will have a similar set up or one where a web browser is built into their TV 😊

Many experts talked about how people would only watch the 30 second variety online and that longer video segments were not effective, which I've argued is not true since day one...

Webisodes are gaining traction as people look to the internet for higher quality video over the YouTube norm and was our strategy since day one..

I fully expect this trend to continue as video quality on the net to improve moving forward..
