WORD HISTORY: Perhaps a desire to see history repeat itself has been at work in the case of an etymology suggested for the verb dicker, first recorded in 1802 with reference to horse trading and the haggling that accompanies it. In a work published in 1848 James Fenimore Cooper used the word with reference to frontier trade. This use would support a connection with the noun dicker, which denotes a quantity of ten and was a common unit used in trading hides or furs. If the verb dicker originated in the fur trade, a parallel would exist with the noun dicker. The noun may have come into the Germanic languages and hence to English by way of trade or tribute in furs between the Germanic peoples and the Roman Empire, with the Germanic word coming from the Latin word decuria, "a group of ten men," which in Late Latin was used as a measure of skins. The difficulty with this parallel is that no existing evidence proves conclusively the derivation of the verb dicker from the noun dicker.
