So I was playing around in the yard with my Mantis and noticed what I thought was fraying on my bridge? When I took a closer look it seems that the end of the bury? is poking out through the sheath? I will try to post pics later. Should I replace it? Fibers of sheath seem to be intact but are contorted by the bury?

Someone posted a similar thread last week. The resident Tethrd users jumped on it to confirm it's just the tag ends of the buries on your splices.

No safety issue at all. The only fraying you should worry about is fraying NOT associated with a tag end such as on the outer sheath or at abrasion points. (Where it rubs either carabiners, cloth from the saddle, other pieces of gear, or the tree)

Samson does not recommend any wrappings on the bury, so a splice done properly will probably look like that at some point in its life.

.....All climbing methods, platforms, saddle designs, and/or use of materials possibly mentioned in the post above are not peer reviewed for safety, and should only be used as an example of my own method. Do your own research and testing before becoming confident in any DIY solution to support your life.

Yes, resident Amsteel users agree it's usually just the tag end showing through the outer cover.

Ditto.
Nothing to worry about.
But its good that you are paying attention to your gear and asking questions when you are unsure.
