Re: Valtrus Innovations Limited

Dear Mr. Rubino,

Your October 16, 2024 letter on behalf of Valtrus Innovations was forwarded to me for response. As you know, FedEx Corporation ("FedEx") is a leader in the logistics and package handling field and it takes intellectual property rights seriously.

We have reviewed your letter in detail and do not understand why Valtrus believes that FedEx products or offerings practice any of the patents listed in your letter. First, we note that the letter does not identify a single FedEx product or service, but rather lists a variety of software products that are made by other companies. While your letter states that a "[p]reliminary analysis reveals that FedEx is currently making, using, selling, or offering for sale products and services that practice (directly or indirectly) one or more of the Valtrus patents," Valrtus's letter provides absolutely no basis to conclude that FedEx uses the various software packages listed. To the contrary, it appears that Valrtus just listed a variety of different programs with no investigation at all into whether FedEx even uses them.

At most, Valtrus's assertions appear to be directed to third party software programs. Moreover, your letter further fails to explain how or why any of these third-party software packages potentially infringe any one of the listed patents. A list of patent numbers devoid of any explanation is simply not a sufficient basis for FedEx to conduct a reasonable investigation. If Valtrus is alleging that one of the listed software programs practices one of its patents, Valtrus must provide a reasonable basis for that belief. Please provide that analysis in relation to a FedEx product so that FedEx can investigate the validity of your assertions against FedEx. If Valtrus wishes to have a discussion with FedEx, please provide a claim chart identifying the specific reasons why you believe that certain FedEx products practice specific patent claims.

Best regards,

Chris Cherry
