Most Significant Contributions

2016/12	Functional interaction of ERAP2 and HLA-B27 activates the unfolded protein response. My studies on the role of ERAP2 in AS, led to the first evidence of a functional significance of the ERAP2 polymorphisms associated with AS. In this study published in arthritis and rheumatology, we showed that polymorphisms that led to decreased ERAP2 function affected antigen processing and HLA-B27 expression in AS patients. The findings were validated using an in vitro system by knocking down ERAP2 in cell lines.
2017/9	MIF drives both inflammation and new bone formation in Ankylosing Spondylitis Till date we have not identified a common link between inflammation and new bone formation, the two cardinal features of AS. My lab showed for the first time that macrophage migration inhibitory factor (MIF) is a significant player in the pathogenesis of AS. My lab showed that Serum MIF can reliably predict progression in patients with AS. My postdoctoral fellow Dr. Ranganathan went on to show that MIF can activate immune cells to produce the pro-inflammatory cytokine TNF as well as drive osteoblasts to new bone formation. This study was published in Arthritis and Rheumatology and formed the basis of a recently funded CIHR grant on targeting MIF in an animal model of SpA.
2013/10	The Impact of TNF-inhibitors on radiographic progression in Ankylosing Spondylitis. I led this landmark study by bringing together investigators from 5 North American centres. This was the first study to show that TNF inhibitors can slow progression in ankylosing spondylitis. This publication led to a paradigm shift in the management of AS patients as it was previously thought that disease modification is not possible in AS.
2012/4	Endoplasmic Reticulum Aminopeptidase 1 (ERAP1) has functionally significant interaction with HLA B27 and dictates subtype specificity in ankylosing spondylitis. This is the first study to show that ERAP1 variants (recently identified as the second strongest genetic association with AS after HLA-B27) can affect the expression of HLA-B27.
2016/9	Development of a Screening Tool for the Identification of Sacroiliitis in Computed Tomography Scans of the Abdomen. We developed a new scoring system for evaluating sacroiliac joints in the CT scans. Till date there was no validated system for evaluating and scoring SI joints for sacroiliitis in CT scans. This system has now been validated in a large inflammatory bowel disease (IBD) cohort. Around 10% of IBD patients have sacroiliitis and almost all get CT scans at some point of time for evaluating their bowel disease. With this scoring system we can reliably identify patients with sacroiliitis from these existing CT scans for further assessment by a rheumatologist.

2015/9

Ankylosing Spondylitis patients have a higher risk of cardiovascular and cerebrovascular mortality.

I have expertise in doing studies on large population databases. I published a large study on 25,000 AS patients, reporting a significant increase in the prevalence of AS especially in females. In a separate paper comparing 21,000 AS patients to 87,000 non-AS controls, I reported a 36% higher risk of dying from heart attacks and strokes in AS patients. This is the largest study of its kind and was published in the Annals of Internal Medicine, the highest ranked subspecialty internal medicine journal (impact factor: 16.59).
